

ARISTOTLE'S

TREATISE ON POETRY,

TRANSLATED:

WITH

N O T E S

ON THE TRANSLATION, AND ON THE ORIGINAL;

AND

TWO DISSERTATIONS,

O N

POETICAL, AND MUSICAL, 'IMITATION.

BY THOMAS TWINING, M.A.

L O N D O N Printed:

And Sold by PAYNE and SON, Mews-Gate; WHITE and SON, Fleet Street; ROBSON and CLARKE, Bond Street; ELMSLY, Strand; CADELL, Strand; ROBINSONS, Paternoster-Row; MERRILLS, Cambridge; and FLETCHER, Oxford,

M, DCC, LXXXIX,

PREFACE.

HOEVER recollects, that, in writing a preface, he prefumes, in some degree or other, to call the attention of the public more particularly to himself, will hardly be disposed to say more than he thinks necessary, and will say even that with some reluctance. To be allowed, however, to explain his own design, in his own desence, is a privilege which every writer may justly claim; and I am too sensible of the impersection of the following work to deliver it up in silent considence to the public judgment.

It may be faid, I think, univerfally, of all translation, that it should give the thoughts of the original with all the accuracy possible, and the language as closely as is consistent with the purpose, which every man who writes must necessarily have in view—that of being read with satisfaction. No work can be read with satisfaction if it is ill written; and every translation is undoubtedly ill written, that does not, as far, at least, as language is concerned, read like an original; that, on the contrary, to every reader, at once discovers itself to be translation, by that constrained uncouthness of expression, harshness of phrase, and embarrassment of meaning, which necessarily result from the transsassor of idiom out of one language into another. A work so translated may be said to be translated into broken English. For the effect is much the same, whether whether we are imperfectly acquainted with the language in which, or adhere too fervilely to the language from which, we speak: whether we write English in Greek, or Greek in English. In both cases we write one language in the idiom of another.

But in steering from this rock, the translator, if he takes too wide a compass, will be in danger of running upon another. fingular, that Pope, in one of his early letters, should have pointed out, by a fenfible and true observation, the very defect, and perhaps the only general defect, of his own Homer. In a letter to Mr. Cromwell he fays, "Let the fense be ever so exactly rendered, " unless an author Looks Like Himself, in his Habit and "MANNER, 'tis a difguife, and not a translation." Now, let every other merit possible be allowed to Pope's translation, it surely cannot be denied, that we have there a manner, a look, a habit, very widely different from that of Homer himself.—But poetical translation is attended with peculiar difficulty, and demands peculiar indulgence. The translator of prose into prose has far less excuse, when he departs fo widely from the words of his author, as to retain no resemblance to his manner; and least of all, perhaps, would fuch liberty be excusable in a version of Aristotle, in whose writings, however perplexing on many other accounts, a translator is feldom embarrafied by any of those delicate "bloffoms of elocu-"tion," which "drop off fo eafily" at his touch.

An English translator, it has been said, "is to exhibit his au-"thor's thoughts in such a dress of diction as the author would "have given them, had his language been English." An idea of translation, to which nothing can be objected, but the difficulty, I might perhaps have said, the impossibility, of its practical application. The rule, therefore, is not rule enough. It leaves too much to the fancy and the prejudices of the translator; who will naturally imagine, that his own, or his favourite, style, whatever it be, is precisely that, which the author, had he written English, would have preferred. Perhaps the end of this rule cannot any way be more securely answered in practice, than by the observance of the rule I first mentioned—to depart no farther from the expression of the original, than is fairly required by the different genius of the two languages.

Letter 24.

b Dr. Johnson's Life of Dryden, p. 125.

In faying what I think ought to be done by every translator, I have of course said, not, I fear, what I have done, but certainly what I have endeavoured to do, myfelf. My object, in few words, was, to produce a version sufficiently close and accurate to satisfy those readers who are acquainted with the original, and, at the fame time, fufficiently English to be read without difgust by those who are not.—Such a version, at the time when I was induced to undertake the task, was certainly among the desiderata of our literature. We had then no English translation that could be read with patience by any one competently acquainted either with the Greek language, or with his own. I know indeed of but two attempts. The one, published in 1705, a mere translation of Dacier's translation, notes, and preface; though professing, in the title-page, to be translated from the original Greek, and accompanied, indeed, by fome marginal improvements from the Greek text, most of which, if admitted into the version, would make it still worse than it is.—The other is a translation from the Greek, I know not by whom, published in 1775. It may speak sufficiently for itself by a few specimens, which, from among many others of the same fort, I have given in the margin.

^{*} Fabricius gives the following account of a translation by Rymer: "Anglice, "Rimero interprete, cum Renati Rapini Observationibus Poeticis, è Gallico in idem "idioma translatis, Lond. 1674."—Bib. Græc. vol. ii. p. 124.—The best inquiries I have been able to make justify me in concluding this account to be a mistake, occastioned by Rymer's translation of Rapin's Restections on Aristotle's Treatise of Poesse, &c.
published in 1694, and to which he prefixed his famous critical Presace.

It would be doing injustice to the translation lately given to the public by Mr. Pye, to place it, in any view, however favourable, by the side of these. A particular and critical examination of its merits would come with little propriety from me. So much, however, I may be allowed to say, for it is an indisputable fact, that Mr. Pye's translation and mine are frequently very different; and that, in many passages, if he is right, I must consess myself to be wrong.

It is natural for me to wish, that I could secure the indulgence of the reader, by giving him some idea of the uncommon dissiculties, with which a translator of this work of Aristotle has to struggle. But they are such as can hardly be conceived, but by those who are well acquainted with the original; and even among them, I may venture to say, can be adequately conceived by those only, who have tried their strength against them by actual experiment. These difficulties arise from various sources: from the elliptic conciseness, and other peculiarities, of Aristotle's style, and from the nature of the work itself, which, in many parts of it at least, seems to have been intended for little more than a collection of hints, or short memorial notes, and has sometimes almost the appearance of a syllabus for lectures, or a table of contents is that

d P. 3, and throughout, ήθη is rendered "morals."—p. 11, and 16, ἀυτοσχεδιασματα, "felf-formed images."—p. 31. προς μεν τις ἀγωνας και την ἀισθησιν—"with regard to the "Controversies and the Conception.—p. 57. ἀτεχνοτεραι—" a degree nearer art."—p. 89. Εχει δε προς το ἐπειτεινεσθαι το μεγεθ. πολυ τι ἡ ἐποποίια ίδιον.—" Epic has much peculiar "for lengthening the greatness."—p. 92. ἀδυνατα και ἐικοτα—" Impossibilities and Suit- able."

[&]quot;—"He has a dry concidencis, that makes one imagine one is peruling a table of contents, rather than a book."—Gray's Letters, Soil. 4. Let. 3. The account Fir. Gray there gives of Ariflotle's writings, though it is written with the fportive pleafantry, that we might apply to it, in some degree, what Aristotle himself is faid to have written to Alexander the Great, who had reprimanded him for having published some private lectures which that Prince had received from him: "They are published," answered the philosopher, "and not published; for they are intelligible "only to those who have been my pupils ." An answer, which does indeed give fome countenance to the affertion of Ammonius, that the obscurity of Aristotle's style was voluntary s. Yet I hope the affertion is not true. I cannot perfuade myself to give full credit to an account fo degrading to a great philosopher. And furely it is but a perverse kind of apology, to assign, of all the causes of obscurity that can be affigued, the only one which leaves it totally without excuse. If, however, this was really the case, it must be confessed, that Aristotle succeeded well, and stood in little need of the admonition of the school-master mentioned by Quintilian, "qui discipulos obscurare quæ dicerent juberet, Græco verbo " utens, Σμοτισον h."—Another confiderable source of difficulty is; that so many of the Tragedies and other poems, alluded to, and quoted, throughout the treatife, are loft.—But the chief of thefe fources, undoubtedly, is the mutilated and corrupt condition of the text. The work is but a fragment: -Πιδακ@ έξ ίερης ολιγη λιβας! -I wish I could add, Αλλ' ήτις καθαρη τε και άχρααντ & άνερπει: but even of this fragment it may be doubted, whether it has been most pleasantry of a familiar letter, is extremely just; except, perhaps, in one observation:—it seems hardly fair to conclude that Aristotle "lost himself;" wherever his readers are now at a loss to find his meaning.

I Ισθι ἐν ἀντες ΚΑΙ ΕΚΔΕΔΟΜΕΝΟΥΣ ΚΑΙ ΜΗ ΕΚΔΕΔΟΜΕΝΟΥΣ· ξυνετοι γαρ ἐισι μονοις τοις ἡμων ἀκεσασιν.—See Aul. Gell. XX. 5. where the two letters, of Alexander and Aristotle, are preserved.

^{*} Πολλαχε τε συνεσφιγμένου, [sc. το είδ των Αρισοτελες συγγραμματων,] και ἀσαφως πεφρασμένου, είδ δια την φυσιν τε γραφαντό, ἀλλ ΈΚΟΥΣΙΩΣ τετο πεποιηκέν. Ammon. ad. Categ. Ariflot. See also Fabric. Bib. Grac. vol. iv. p. 166. -άσαφειαν ἐπιτηδεύων.

h Quintil, VIII. 2.

injured by mutilation, or by repair. The history given by Strabo, of the fate of Aristotle's works after his death, is so curious, and so effectually removes all wonder at the mangled state in which we find them, that I shall here, for the sake of the English reader, insert a translation of it.

"The Socratic philosophers, Eraftus and Corifcus, were natives " of Scepfis; as was also Neleus, (the fon of Corifcus,) who was " a scholar of Aristotle and Theophrastus, and to whom the latter " bequeathed his library, in which was included that of Aristotle. " For Aristotle, who, as far as we know, was the first collector of "books, and the first who taught the kings of Egypt to form and "arrange a library, left his own collection of books, (as he also "did his school,) to Theophrastus; and from Theophrastus it "came to Neleus. Neleus removed it to Scepsis, and left it to "his descendants; who, being illiterate persons, threw the books "together as lumber, and locked them up: but afterwards, when "they heard, that the Attalic monarchs, their fovereigns, were " taking great pains to collect books for the Pergamenian library, "they concealed them in a cave under ground; whence, after "having been long damaged by damp and worms", the books both " of Aristotle and Theophrastus were, at length, sold by some of "the family, at a great price, to Apellicon the Teian. " was rather a lover of books, than a lover of wisdom, or a Philoso-" pher ; and being therefore anxious to reftore, at any rate, those " parts of the manuscripts that had been destroyed or damaged, he "had them fairly copied; and, the vacuities in the writing being " unskilfully supplied, they were thus published, full of blunders. The "old Peripatetics, who fucceeded Theophrastus, possessing none "of these writings, except a very few, and those chiefly of the

¹ A city of Myfia.

^κ Ύπο νοτιας και σητων κακωβεντα —.

¹ Φινεβιβι. μανλεν ή φιλεσερ.—Α very modern fort of character.

" exoteric kind, were not qualified to philosophize accurately, but " contented themselves with treating, in a shewy and superficial " manner, fuch particular questions as were proposed. The later " Peripatetics, however, who lived after the publication of those "books, were enabled to teach the Aristotelic doctrines with more "exactness; yet even they, from the multitude of errors in their "copies, were frequently obliged to have recourse to explanations "merely conjectural. And these errors were much increased at "Rome. For immediately on the death of Apellicon, Sylla, "when he took Athens, possessed himself of his library, and "carried it to Rome; where the books fell into the hands of "Tyrannio the Grammarian, a great admirer of Aristotle, who "procured them from the librarian; and afterwards into those "of certain bookfellers, who employed careless and ignorant "transcribers, and neglected to collate the copies with the ori-"ginals; which is also the case with many other books trans-"cribed for fale, both at Rome and Alexandria"."

In the division of the translation into Parts and Sections, there was no authority to restrain me from following my own ideas, and preferring that method which appeared most conducive to clearness.—By the marginal titles the convenience of the reader is consulted: he has the work, and its index, under his eye at the same time.—The order of the chapters I have not attempted to disturb. But if, on the one hand, I cannot admit the unnecessary and licentious transpositions of Heinsius, neither can I, on the other, assent to those commentators, who, like Dacier, defend, on all occasions, the common arrangement as authentic. If they are right, we must suppose one of the most strict and methodical of philosophers to have been sometimes almost as careless as old Montagne; who, as he tells us pleasantly, "n'avoit point d'autre "fergent de bande à ranger ses pieces que la fortune."

Strabo, lib. xiii. p. 608, D. ed. Cafaub.—See alfo Plutarch's life of Sylla, p. 856. ed. H. St. and Bayle, art. Tyrannion.

Every translation should be accompanied with such explanations as are necessary to render it intelligible to those readers who are supposed, chiefly, to have recourse to translation; those, who are totally unacquainted with the language of the original. This is the object of the short notes under the version; in which, however, I have sometimes referred to the larger notes, when they were such as would answer the same purpose.

These last-mentioned notes, which follow the translation, and the two differtations prefixed to it, (which indeed are but longer notes thrown into that form,) I wish to be considered as the principal part of my design. They form a full, and nearly a continued, commentary. My purpose was, to discuss all the difficulties of the original, of whatever kind: to remove, or at least to diminish them, where I could; where I could not, to state them fairly, and to confess them—the easiest part, certainly, of a commentator's duty, though not, perhaps, that, which is most commonly discharged.

As a great part of these difficulties arise from the obscurity or corruption of the Greek text, a great part of my comment is, of course, taken up by philological and verbal criticism. But though my plan obliged me to submit to an employment which wit has disgraced by the name of "word-catching," I hope it will not be found that I altogether "live on syllables"." It is, indeed, rather hard upon a commentator, that he should be expected to "catch" the meaning of his author, and, at the same time, reproached for endeavouring to catch the words in which that meaning is contained. But, in executing this part of my task, I must consess myself to have, indeed, an insatiable appetite for obscurity, if I have discovered any desire of finding the text more corrupt and thutilated than it is. Where I have indulged conjecture, I hope I have always remembered that it is conjecture, and have neither n a Each word-catcher, that lives on fyllables."—Pope's Ep. to Arbuthnot.

infulted the reader, nor difgraced myself, by the disgusting, though privileged, language of emendatory criticism on antient authors. A Latin commentator, indeed, may lay any wager, that his author wrote this, or that; may affert his emendation to be clearer than light itself, and say to his reader, if you are not a blockbead, you will be of my opinion, &c.—" Nobis non licet esse tam disertis."

They, who think any interpretation better than none, may perhaps with, that I had not employed to confiderable a portion of my notes in merely stating difficulties which had not been fully seen or fairly acknowledged, without attempting to remove them; in combating interpretations hitherto acquiesced in as satisfactory, and shewing, that many passages, supposed to be sufficiently understood, are yet to be explained. This is certainly not that part of a commentator's duty, which is most pleasant, either to his readers, or himself; but it is surely a necessary and indispensable part of it, and I have endeavoured to discharge it faithfully. I hope I have no where either made a difficulty to shew my sagacity, or dissembled one to conceal the want of it.

We live in a delicate and fastidious age, in which learning, even in books, is hardly released from the necessity of observing, in some degree, what Fontenelle calls "the exterior decencies of "ignorance"." But, if pedantry be an unnecessary, unseasonable, and therefore oftentatious, display of learning, I should hope, that the nature of my work would sufficiently secure me against that charge. It will scarce be thought strange, that notes, intended to explain a Greek author, and supposed, of course, to be addressed to Greek scholars, should abound with Greek quotations. One of my chief objects was, to illustrate Aristotle, wherever I could, from himself, and from Plato, to whose opinions and writings he continually alludes. Another was, to relieve the dryness of so much philological discussion by passages, which, at the same time that they throw light upon the author, might also be expected to afford some pleasure to the reader, either as beautiful, or as curious. With the same view, I have now and then ventured to quit, for a moment, my direct path; to transgress Seneca's rule, "Quò ducit materia sequendum est, non quò "invitat," and to avail myself of some of those many openings, which Aristotle affords, into collateral, though not irrelative inquiries.

[&]quot; Quovis pignore contenderim."—" Luce meridiana clarius."—" Tu, fi fapis, mecum repone."—&c. &c.

[&]quot; "Les bienséances extérieures de l'ignorance."

The time is come, when we no longer read the antients with our judgments shackled by determined admiration; when even from the editor and the commentator, it is no longer required as an indispensable duty, that he should see nothing in his author but perfection. No apology therefore, I trust, will be required from me, for speaking freely of the defects of this work of Aristotle, even where those defects appear to be his own.

It is necessary to mention, that many of my notes were written, and of more the materials were prepared, before I consulted, or indeed had it in my power to consult, some of the earliest and best commentators, whose works are too scarce to be procured at the moment they are wanted. In perusing them I might often have adopted the exclamation of the old Grammarian , "Pereant, "qui ante nos nostra dixerunt!" But "every thing," says Epictetus, "has two handles;" and it required but little philosophy in this case, to be more pleased with the support which my opinions received from such coincidence, than mortisted by the mere circumstance of prior occupation: a circumstance, which, after all, could not deprive me of the property of my own thoughts, though, as Dr. Johnson has observed on a similar occasion, I certainly can prove that property only to myfelf.—This coincidence, whereever I found it, I have ferupulously pointed out.

⁹ Donatus.

^{*} Pref. to Shakspeare.

How much subsequent commentators, and Dacier in particular, have been obliged to the labours of those learned, acute, and indefatigable Italians, will perhaps fufficiently appear from the use I have made of them, and the frequent extracts, which the scarceness of their books has induced me to give from them in my notes. This I must be allowed to say, that, in my opinion, great injustice is done to their merits by those editors, who not only neglect to avail themselves of their assistance, but affect also to speak of them with contempt. The truth is, that to confult them is a work of confiderable labour, and requires no finall degree of patience and refolution. The trouble we are unwilling to take, we eafily perfuade ourselves to think not worth taking; and plaufible reasons are readily given, and as readily admitted, for neglecting, what those, to whom we make our apology, are, in general, as little disposed to take the pains of examining as ourselves. And thus, "Difficultas laborque dis-"cendi DISERTAM NEGLIGENTIAM REDDIT"."

In what I have here faid, I allude, more particularly, to the commentaries of Castelvetro and Beni'. Their prolixity, their scholastic and trisling subtilty, their useless tediousness of logical analysis, their microscopic detection of difficulties invisible to ⁵ Gic. de Divin. I. 47.

[·] Poetica d'Aristotele vulgarizzata e sposta per Lodovico Castelvetro, &c. Basil.

Pauli Benii, Eugubini, &c. in Aristotelis Poeticam Commentarii, &c. Venet. 1624. Castelvetro's criticism is well characterized, and its effect upon his reader well described, by Gravina: "E perchè il Castelvetro, quanto è acuto e diligente, ed amator del vero, tanto è difficile ed affannoso per quelle scolastiche reti, che agli altri ed a se stessii, allora, i maggiori ingegni tendeano; perciò, per dispetto fpesso e per rabbia vien da' lettori abbandonato, ed è da loro condannato, prima che intendano la sua ragione; la quale si rincrescono tirar suori da quei labirinti delle sue sottili e moleste distinzioni." Della Tragedia, p. 75.

the naked eye of common fense, and their waste of consutation upon objections made only by themselves, and made on purpose to be consuted—all this, it must be owned, is disgusting and repulsive. It may sufficiently release a commentator from the duty of reading their works throughout, but not from that of examining and consulting them: for in both these writers, but more especially in Beni, there are many remarks equally acute and solid; many difficulties well seen, clearly stated, and, sometimes, successfully removed; many things usefully illustrated, and judiciously explained; and if their freedom of censure is now and then disgraced by a little disposition to cavil, this becomes almost a virtue, when compared with the service and implicit admiration of Dacier, who, as a fine writer has observed, avoit fait vœu d'être de l'avis d'Aristote, soit qu'il l'entendit ou qu'il ne l'entendit pas "."

Of the translations and commentaries written in the Italian language there is one, which deserves particular notice, though, by what hard sate I know not, it seems scarce to have been noticed at all: I mean that of Piccolomini*. His version, though sometimes rather paraphrastical, is singularly exact; and, on the whole, more saithful to the sense, or at least to what I conceive to be the sense, of Aristotle, than any other that I have seen. In his commentary, he has nothing of the Quixotism of Castelvetro and Beni. He does not sally forth so eagerly to the relief of distressed readers, as to create the distress for the sake of shewing his prowess in surmounting it. Some commentators appear to be really disappointed, when they find any thing which they cannot deny to u Marmontel, Poetique Françoise, Pref. p. 6.

^{*} Annotationi di M. Alessandro Piccolomini, nel libro della Poetica d'Aristotele; con la traduttione del medesimo libro in lingua volgare. In Vinegia. 1575.—Piccolomini was archbishop of Patras. See Bayle. He also wrote Copiosissima Parasirase nel Retorica d'Aristotele. Venet. 1565. A clear, exact, and useful work, though prolix, and an unpleasant mixture of translation and comment.

be intelligible. Piccolomini fairly endeavoured to understand his author; and, which is no small praise, seems always to have understood himself. His annotations, though often prolix and diffused, are generally sensible, and always clear. They will sometimes tire the reader, but seldom, I think, perplex him.

With respect to the original work itself, it would be superfluous to enter, here, into any discussion of its merits and its de-My ideas of both will fufficiently appear in the course of my notes. I must however remark one point of view, in which the criticism of Aristotle has always particularly struck me, though it feems to have been little noticed: And that is, that his philosophy, austere and cold as it appears, has not encroached upon his taste. He has not indeed expressed that taste by mixing the language of admiration with that of philosophy in his inveftigation of principles, but he has discovered it in those principles themselves; which, in many respects at least, are truly poetical principles, and fuch as afford no countenance to that fort of criticism, which requires the Poet to be "of reason all compact." Aristotle, on the contrary, every where reminds him, that it is his business to represent, not what is, but what should be; to look beyond actual and common nature, to the ideal model of perfection in his own mind. He fees fully, what the rationalifts among modern critics have not always feen, the power of popular opinion and belief upon poetical credibility "-that " a legend, a tale, a "tradition, a rumour, a fuperflition - in short, any thing, is "enough to be the basis of the poet's air-formed vi/ions "." He never loses fight of the end of Poetry, which, in conformity to common fense, he held to be pleasurez. He is ready to excuse, not only impossibilities, but even absurdities, where that end x See the translation, Part IV. Sect. 1. and the note there: Sect. 3, and 6.

y Letters on Chivalry and Romance, p. 300.

^{*} This I have endeavoured to prove in Note 277.

appears to be better answered with them, than it would have been without them. In a word, he afferts the privileges of Poetry, and gives her free range to employ her whole power, and to do all she can do—that is, to impose upon the imagination, by whatever means, as far as imagination, for the sake of its own pleasure, will consent to be imposed upon. Poetry can do no more than this, and, from its very nature and end, ought not to be required to do less. If it is our interest to be cheated, it is her duty to cheat us. The critic, who suffers his philosophy to reason away his pleasure, is not much wifer than the child, who cuts open his drum, to see what it is within that caused the found.

The English reader of Aristotle will, I hope, do him (and, I may add, his translator,) so much justice, as to recollect, when the improvements of modern criticism occur to him, that he is reading a book, which was written above two thousand years ago, and which, for the reasons already given, can be considered as little more than the fragment of a fragment. What would have been the present state of poetical criticism, had Aristotle never written, it is impossible to say: two sacts, however, are certain; that he was the first who carried philosophical investigation into these regions of imagination and siction, and that the ablest of his successors have not distained to pursue the path which he had opened to them, and even, in many instances, to tread in his very sootsteps. It may therefore, possibly, be true, that modern critics are, in some measure, indebted to Aristotle himself for their very pretensions to despise him. At least, the more we admire the skill of those, who have raised and finished the structure, the more reason we have to respect the Architect, who not only gave the plan, but, with it, many specimens of masterly execution.

² Part IV. Sect 2. and p. 120.

^{*} I allude to the ingenious saying of Gorgias, who called Tragedy, " an impo-"stion, where they who cheat us are honester than they who do not cheat us, and they " who are cheated, wifer than they who are not cheated."—Την τραγφθίαν είπεν ἀπατην, ήν ὁ ἀπατισας διπαιστες τε μη ἀπωτησαντ, και ὁ ἀπατηθεις σεφωτες τε μη ἀπατηθεντ. Plut. de and. Poet. p. 26. ed. H. S.

With respect to my own work, I have already faid all that I thought it necessary to fay, by way of explaining its defign, and of apologizing for fuch particulars in the execution of it, as might appear most liable to exception. To suppose it free from imperfection and error, would be not only to forget the nature of the work, but to forget myself. I commit it with the less anxiety to the candour of the public, as I am confident, (and it is the only confidence I allow myfelf to feel,) that the time and the labour I have bestowed upon it will, at least, acquit me of that disrespectful indifference to the public judgment, which hafte and negligence It is now fix years fince the translation was finished; and both that, and the differtations and notes, have received every advantage of revision and correction, which either my own care, or friendly criticism, could give them. And, upon this occasion, I cannot refuse myself the gratification of publicly acknowledging how much I owe to the accurate judgment and just taste of one person ', in particular, in whom I found precisely that friendly cenfor, fo happily and fo comprehensively characterized by the Poet as

- " Eager to praife, yet refolute to blame,
- "Kind to his verse, but kinder to his same ":"

—and of whom, indeed, I may fay, without any fear of indulging too far the partiality of friendship, that he never shrinks from any task, whether of private kindness, or more general benevolence, that calls for his assistance, and stands in need of his abilities.

- · The Rev. Dr. Forster, of Colchester.
- d Hayley's Epistle on the death of Mr. Thornton,

TAKE the only opportunity now left me to mention a L book, which was very lately fent to me by a friend, and which I have read with great pleasure; - Dramaturgie, ou Observations critiques sur plusieurs pieces de Théatre, tant anciennes que modernes: [Paris 1785]—a translation from the German of the late Mr. Lefling. The notice taken of the original work in Mr. Winstanley's edition of Aristotle had, indeed, long ago excited my curiofity; but I am unacquainted with the German language, and my inquiries afforded me no reason to conclude that the work had been translated. It contains many excellent and uncommon things. Mr. Lesling appears to me to have possessed, in no ordinary degree, that combination of taste and philosophy of strength of feeling and strength of thought-upon which good and original criticism depends. He had, it feems, particularly applied himself to the study of Aristotle's treatise on Poetry; as indeed fufficiently appears from feveral masterly discussions of difficult and contested passages in that work. I cannot but regret, that he did not write a regular commentary on the whole. From the specimens he has given, I have no doubt, that it would have been, in many respects, far superior to any other work of the kind; though, at the same time, those specimens afford us reason to conclude, that we should have found in it some instances of refinement, upon Aristotle, at least, if not upon the truth; and that, like many other ingenious men, he would, now and then, have transferred his own ingenuity to his author. Something of this refinement, I think, there is in his explanation of Aristotle's definition of Tragedy, and of the purgation of the passions, tome 2. p. 6-35. After considering, very attentively, that, and and some other explanations, in which he differs from me, I have not yet found reason to alter my opinion. But, had I seen this ingenious work in time, I should certainly have paid every attention due to the opinions of such a writer, by availing myself of his support, where we agree, and by giving my reasons, where we differ.

[xix]

ERRATA.

```
Page 6. line 33. for and, read et.
     26. — 31, and in some other Italian quotations where it occurs, for et, r. e.
     37. — 24. for way, r. manner.
     42. — 3 from lottom, r. Eumæus
     58. — 5. for note, r. differtation.
    132. — 14.
                             r. Callippides.
    133. — 11.
                           r. Solistratus.
    137-168. In the references prefixed to the 11 first Notes, for p. 1, read p. 65.
            for p. 2, and 3, r. p. 66. for p. 4, r. p. 67.
    155. note 1.
                             r. Satyricâ.
    161. line 2.
                             r. Ewowoiia.
    164. note c. for 44,
                             r. 8.
    ibid. line 20.
                             r. dexinstition.
    173. after, ANΘΡΩΠΩΝ, infert [De Leg. VII. p. 798. D.]
    174. note P. for 81, r. 50.—note q. for 85, r. 51.
    209. note f.
                            r. Anapæstic.
    224. line 7. for, or r, for.
    271. note 4.
                               r. ouvesnoev.
    311. line 19.
                               τ. καλλιση.
    318. note 5. for vol. ii. r. vol. i.
                   for ab fuit r. abfuit.
    324. note 3.
    376. line 6.
                             τ. συναπεργαζομενον.
    4.18. line 8.
                               r. ήττω, and πρειττω.
    425. note k.
                               1. wordais.
    434. note b.
                   for vol. i. r. vol. ii.
    471. penult.
                               r. in \O', or, in TE.
    506. 5 & 6.
                              r. travailloit.
     536. note c.
                              r. 326.
```

T W O

DISSERTATIONS.

- I. ON POETRY CONSIDERED AS AN IMITATIVE ART.
- II. ON THE DIFFERENT SENSES OF THE WORD, IMITATIVE, AS APPLIED TO MUSIC BY THE ANTIENTS, AND BY THE MODERNS.

>

DISSERTATION I.

ON POETRY CONSIDERED AS AN IMITATIVE ART.

HE word Imitation, like many others, is used, sometimes in a strict and proper sense, and sometimes in a sense more or less extended and improper. Its application to poetry is chiefly of the latter kind. Its precise meaning, therefore, when applied to poetry in general, is by no means obvious. No one who has feen a picture is at any lofs to understand how painting is imitation. But no man, I believe, ever heard or read, for the first time, that poetry is imitation, without being conscious in fome degree, of that "confusion of thought" which an ingenious writer complains of having felt whenever he has attempted to explain the imitative nature of Music^a. It is easy to see whence this confusion arises, if we consider the process of the mind when words thus extended from their proper fignifications are prefented to it. We are told that "Poetry is an imitative art." In order to conceive how it is fo, we naturally compare it with painting, sculpture, and such arts as are strictly and clearly imitative. But, in this comparison, the difference is so much more obvious and striking than the refemblance—we see so much more readily in what respects poetry is not properly imitation, than in what respects it is;—that the mind, at last, is lest in that fort of perplexity which must always arise from words thus loosely and analogically applied, when the analogy is not sufficiently clear and obvious; that is, when, of that mixture of circumstances, like and unlike, which constitutes analogy, the latter are the most apparent.

[•] Dr. Beattie, Essay on Poetry, &c. ch. vi. §. 1.

In order to understand the sollowing treatise on poetry, in which imitation is considered as the very essence of the art, it seems necessary to satisfy ourselves, if possible, with respect to two points; I. In what senses the word Imitation is, or may be, applied to Poetry. II. In what senses it was so applied by Aristotle.

I.

THE only circumstance, I think, common to everything we denominate imitation, whether properly or improperly, is resemblance, of some fort or other.

In every imitation, strictly and properly so called, two conditions seem essential:—the resemblance must be immediate; i. e. between the imitation, or imitative work, itself, and the object imitated;—and, it must also be obvious. Thus, in sculpture, sigure is represented by similar sigure; in painting, colour and sigure, by similar colour and sigure; in personal imitation, or mimicry, voice and gesture, by similar voice and gesture. In all these instances, the resemblance is obvious; we recognize the object imitated: and it is, also, immediate; it lies in the imitative work, or energy, itself; or, in other words, in the very materials, or sensible media, by which the imitation is conveyed. All these copies, therefore, are called, strictly and intelligibly, imitations.

b See the fecond part of this Differtation.

[·] See Mr. Harris's Treatife on Music, &c. ch. i.

1. The materials of poetic imitation are words. These may be confidered in two views; as founds merely, and as founds fignificant, or arbitrary and conventional figns of ideas. It is evidently, in the first view only, that words can bear any real resemblance to the things expressed; and, accordingly, that kind of imitation which confifts in the refemblance of words confidered as mere SOUND, to the founds and motions of the objects imitated 4, has usually been affigned as the only instance in which the term imitative is, in its strict and proper sense, applicable to Poetry . But fetting afide all that is the effect of fancy and of accommodated pronunciation in the reader, to which, I fear, many passages, repeatedly quoted and admired as the happiest coincidences of found and fense, may be reduced f; setting this aside, even in such words, and fuch arrangements of words, as are actually, in some degree, analogous in found or motion to the thing fignified or described, the resemblance is so faint and distant, and of so general and vague a nature, that it would never, of itself, lead us to recognize the object imitated. We discover not the likeness till we know the meaning. The natural relation of the word to the thing fignified, is pointed out only by its arbitrary or conventional relation^g.—I do not here mean to deny that fuch refemblances. however is commonly cited as an example of this fort of imitation. I question, however, whether this line would have been remarked by any one as particularly harsh, if a harsh d Mr. Harris's Treatife, &c. ch. iii.

[·] Mr. Harris.-Lord Kaims, Elements of Criticism, vol. ii. p. 1.

The reader may fee this fufficiently proved by Dr. Johnson in his Lives of the Poets, vol. iv. p. 183. astave, and in the Rambler, N° 92. "In such resemblances," as he well observes, "the mind often governs the ear, and the sounds are estimated by their meaning." See also Lord Kaims, El. of Crit. vol. ii. p. 84, 85, g See Harris on Music, &c. ch. iii. §. 7, 2. This verse of Virgil, Stridenti miserum stipula disperdere carmen—however flight and delicate where they really are, and however liable to be discovered by fancy where they are not, are yet a source of real beauties, of beauties actually felt by the reader, when they arise, or appear to arise, spontaneously from the poet's feeling, and their harsh sound had not been described in it. At least, many verses full as harshly conftructed might, I believe, be produced, in which no fuch imitation can be fupposed. But, even admitting that such imitation was here intended, it seems to me almost ridiculous to talk of the "natural relation between the found of this verse, and "that of a vile hauthoy." [Harris, in the chapter above referred to.] All that can be faid is, that the founds are, both of them, harsh founds; but, certainly no one fpecies of harsh found can well be more unlike another, than the found of a rough verse is to the tone of a bad hautboy, or, indeed, of any other musical instrument.-That, in the clearest and most acknowledged instances of such imitative vocal sound; the refemblance is, or can possibly be, so exact as to lead a person unacquainted with the language, by the found alone, to the fignification, no man in his fenses would affert. Yet Dr. Beattie, in a note, p. 304, of his Essay on Poetry, &c. by a mistake for which I am at a loss to account, has ascribed so extravagant a notion to Rousseau. "There is in Taflo's Gicrusalemme Liberata, a samous stanza, of which Rousseau "fays, that a good ear and fincere heart are alone able to judge of it;" meaning, as appears from what follows, of its fense; for he adds, "The imitative harmony and "the poetry are indeed admirable; but I doubt whether a person who understands " neither Italian nor Latin, could even guess at the meaning from the sound." There can be no room for doubt in this matter;—he certainly could not: nor does Rouffeau appear to have even hinted the possibility of such a thing. The passage is in his admirable letter Sur la Musique Françoise; where, in order to obviate the prejudices of those who regard the Italian language as wholly soft and effeminate, he produces two stanzas of Tasso, the one as an example of a fweet and tender, the other of a forcible and nervous, combination of founds: and he adds, that to judge of this, i. e. of the found only, not the fense, of the stanzas, and also of the impossibility of rendering adequately the fweetness of the one, or the force of the other, in the French language, "it is not necessary to understand Italian—it is sufficient that we have an " ear, and are impartial."-" Que ceux qui pensent que l'Italien n'est que le lan-" gage de la douceur and de la tendresse, prennent la peine de comparer entre elles "ces deux strophes du Taffe:-et s'ils desesperent de rendre en François la douce " harmonie de l'une, qu'ils cffayent d'exprimer la rauque dureté de l'autre: il n'est pas " besoin pour juger de eeci d'entendre la langue, il ne faut qu' avoir des oreilles & de " la bonne foi."

effect is not counteracted by the obviousness of cool intention, and deliberate artifice. Nor do I mean to object to this application of the word imitative. My purpose is merely to shew, that when we call this kind of resemblance, imitation, we do not use the word in its strict sense—that, in which it is applied to a picture, or a statue. Of the two conditions above mentioned, it h I am persuaded that many very beautiful and striking passages of this kind in the best poets were solely φυσεως ἀυτοματιζεσης ἐργα, not τεχνης μιμησασθαι τα γινομενα πειρωμενης, as it is well expressed by Dion. Hal. Περι συνθεσεως, § 20.—But the Critic is always too ready to transfer his own reslection to the Poet; and to consider as the effects of art, all those spontaneous strokes of genius which become the causes of art by his calm observation and discussion. Scarce any poet has, I think, so many beauties of this kind, fairly produced by strength of imagination, and delicacy of ear, as Virgil. Yet there are some verses frequently cited as sine examples in this way, which appear to me too visibly artificial to be pleasing: such as——

Quadrupedante putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.

I am tempted to add to this note a passage from the first differtation prefixed to the Æneid by that excellent editor, C. G. Heyne; -- a man who has honourably distinguished himself from the herd of commentators, by such a degree of taste and philosophy as we do not often find united with laborious and accurate erudition. Speaking of the charms of Virgil's versification, he says, "Illud unum monebimus, in errorem "inducere juvenilem animum videri eos qui nimii in eo funt, ut ad rerum fonos et "naturas accommodatos & formatos velint effe versus. Equidem non diffitcor " fensum animi me refragantem habere, quotiescunque persuadere mihi volo, magnum "aliquem poetam æstu tantarum rerum abreptum et magnorum phantasinatum vi " inflammatum, in fono curfus equestris vel tubæ vel aliarum rerum reddendo laborare; "attenuat ea res et deprimit ingenium poetæ & artis dignitatem. Sunt tamen, ais, "tales versus in optimo quoque poetà. Recte; sunt utique multi; etsi plures alios " ad hoc lusus genus accommodare solet eorum ingenium qui talibus rebus indulgent. "Sed mihi ad poetices indolem propius esse videtur statuere, issam orationis naturam "ita esse comparatam, ut multarum rerum sonos exprimat; instammatum autem " phantasmatum specie objectà animum, cum rerum species sibi obversantes ut ora-"tione vivide exprimat laborat, necessario in ista vocabula incidere, vel orationis pro-" prietate ducente. Ita graves et celeres, lenes ac duros sonos, vel non id agens et « curans, ad rerum naturam accommodabit et orator quifque bonus, et multo magis "poeta." [Heyne's Virgil, vol, ii, p. 39.]

wants that which must be regarded as most essential. The resemblance is, indeed, real, as far as it goes, and immediate; but, necessarily, from its generality, so imperfect, that even when pointed out by the sense, it is by no means always obvious, and without that, cannot possibly lead to any thing like a clear and certain recognition of the particular object imitated. I must observe farther, that this kind of imitation, even supposing it much more perfect, is, by no means, that which would be likely first to occur to any one, in an enquiry concerning the nature of the imitation attributed to Poetry, were it not, that the circumstance of its real and immediate resemblance, has occasioned its being considered, I think not justly, as the strictest sense of the term so applied.

For the most usual, and the most important senses, and even, as will perhaps appear, for the strictest sense, in which Poetry has i The causes of this impersection are accurately pointed out by Mr. Harris; 1. The "natural sounds and motions which Poetry thus imitates, are themselves but "loose and indefinite accidents of those subjects to which they belong, and consequently "do but loosely and indefinitely characterise them. 2. Poetic sounds and motions do but faintly resemble those of nature, which are themselves consessed to be so impersect and vague." [Treatise on Music, &c. ch. iii. § 2. See also ch. ii. § 3.] The sollowing is a samous imitative line of Boileau:

S'en va frapper le mur, & revient en roulant.

If this line were read to any one ignorant of the language, he would be so far from guessing was imitated, that it would not, I believe, occur to him that anything was imitated at all; unless, indeed, the idea were forced upon his mind by the pronuntiation of the reader. Now, suppose him to understand French:—as the circumstance of rolling is mentioned in the line, he might possibly notice the effect of the letter R, and think the poet intended to express the noise of something that rolled. And this is all the real resemblance that can be discovered in this verse: a resemblance, and that too, but distant and impersect, in the sound of a letter to the sound of rolling in general. For anything beyond this, we must trust to our imagination, affished by the commentator, who assure us, that the poet "a cherché à imiter par le "son des mots, le bruit que fait une assure en roulant." Sat. iii. v. 216.

been, or may be, understood to imitate, we must have recourse to language considered in its most important point of view, as composed, not of sounds merely, but of sounds significant.

2. The most general and extensive of these senses, is that in which it is applied to description, comprehending, not only that poetic landscape-painting which is peculiarly called descriptive Poetry, but all such circumstantial and distinct representation as conveys to the mind a strong and clear idea of its object, whether sensible or mental*. Poetry, in this view, is naturally considered as more or less imitative, in proportion as it is capable of raising an ideal image or picture, more or less resembling the reality of things. The more distinct and vivid the ideas are of which this picture is composed, and the more closely they correspond to the actual impressions received from nature, the stronger will be the resemblance, and the more perfect the imitation.

Hence it is evident that, of all description, that of visible objects will be the most imitative, the ideas of such objects being of all others, the most distinct and vivid. That fuch description, therefore, should have been called imitation, can be no wonder; and, indeed, of all the extended or analogical applications of the word, k Nothing is more common than this application of the word to description; though the writers who so apply it have not always explained the ground of the application, or pointed out those precise properties of description which entitle it to be considered as imitation. Mr. Addison makes use of description as a general term, comprehending all poetic imitation, or imitation by language, as opposed to that of painting, &c. See Speciator No 416. I. C. Scaliger, though he extended imitation to speech in general, [see Part II. Note 1.] did not overlook the circumstances which render description peculiarly imitative. He says, with his usual spirit, speaking of poetic or verbal imitation,—"At imitatio non uno modo; quando ne res quidem. "Alia namque est simplex designatio, ut, Eneas pugnat: alia modos addit et circums shantias; verbi gratid—armatas, in eque, iratus. Jam hic est pugnantis etiam facies, "non solum actio. Ita adjunctae circumstantiae, loci, affectus, occasionis, &c. pleniocerm adhue atque torestorem efficient imitationem." [Poet. lib. vii. cap. 2.] We must not, however, consound imitative description with such description as is merely an enumeration of parts. See note m, second part of this differtation.

Cli

this is, perhaps, the most obvious and natural. There needs no other proof of this than the very language in which we are naturally led to express our admiration of this kind of poetry, and which we perpetually borrow from the arts of strict imitation. We say the poet has painted his object; we talk of his imagery, of the lively colours of his description, and the masterly touches of his pencil^m.

The objects of our other fenses fall less within the power of description, in proportion as the ideas of those objects are more simple, more fleeting, and less distinct, than those of fight. The description of such objects is, therefore, called with less propriety imitation.

- ¹ Τα δε ΟΨΕΙ γνωριμα, δια ποιητικής έρμηνειας έμφαινεται ΜΙΜΗΤΙΚΩΤΕΡΟΝ· όιον, κυματων όψεις, και τοποθεσιαι, και μαχαι, και περισασεις παθων· ώσε συνδιατιθεσθαι τας ψυχας τοις έιδεσι των άπαγγερρομένων, ΩΣ ΩΡΩΜΕΝΟΙΣ. Ptol. Harmon. 3. 3.
- It cannot be necessary to produce examples of this. They are to be found in almost every page of every writer on the subject of poetry. The reader may see Dr. Hurd's Discourse on Poetical Imitation, p. 10, &c.—Dr. Beattie's Essay on Poetry and Music, p. 97, (Ed. 8vo.) and the note.—Dr. Warton on Pope, vol. i. p. 44, 45; vol. ii. 223, 227.—Lord Kaims, Elem. of Criticism, vol. ii. p. 326.

Nor is this manner of speaking peculiar to modern writers. Φερε ἐν, says Ælian, introducing his description of the Vale of Tempe: και τα καλθμενα Τεμπκ, τα Θετταλικα, ΔΙΑΓΡΑΨΩΜΕΝ το λογώ, και ΔΙΑΠΛΑΣΩΜΕΝ. And he adds, as in justification of these expressions, ὑμολογηται γας και ὁ λογώ, ἐαν ἐχη δυλαμιν φρατικη, μηθεν ἀσθειεσερον ὑσα βελεται ΔΕΙΚΝΥΝΑΙ των ἀνδρων των κατα χειρκργιαν δείνων. Hist. Var. lib. iii. εαρ. 1. Hence, also, the saying of Simonides, so often repeated, that "a picture is "a filent poem, and a poem a speaking picture." Lucian, in that agreeable delineation of a beautiful and accomplished woman, his ΕΙΚΟΝΕΣ, ranks the descriptive poet with the painter and the sculptor: ταυτα μεν ἐν ΠΛΑΣΤΩΝ και ΓΡΑΦΕΩΝ και ΠΟΙΗΤΩΝ σεωθες ἐργασονται. Homer, he denominates, τον ἀρισον ΤΩΝ ΓΡΑΦΕΩΝ, "the best of painters;" and calls upon him, even in preference to Polygnotus, Apelles, and the most eminent artists, to paint the charms of his Panthea. See also the treatise Πε,ι της ΟΜΗΡΟΥ ποιησεως, towards the end. (Ει δε και Ζωγραφιας διδασκαλον Ομηςον φαιη τις—κ. τ. αλλ.—)

" One obvious reason of this is, the want of that natural association just remarked, with painting, (the most striking of the strictly imitative arts,) which is peculiar to the description of visible objects.

Next

Next to visible objects, founds seem the most capable of descriptive imitation. Such description is, indeed, generally aided by real, though imperfect, resemblance of verbal found; more, or less, according to the nature of the language, and the delicacy of the poet's ear. The following lines of Virgil are, I think, an instance of this.

Lamentis gemituque et fæmineo ululatu Tecta fremunt, refonat magnis plangoribus æther.

An. iv. 663.

But we are not, now, confidering this immediate imitation of found by found, but fuch only as is merely descriptive, and operates, like the description of visible objects, only by the meaning of the words. Now if we are allowed to call description of visible objects, imitation, when it is such that we seem to see the object, I know of no reason why we may not also consider sounds as imitated, when they are so described that we seem to bear them. It would not be difficult to produce from the best poets, and even from prose-writers of a strong and poetical imagination, many instances of sound so imitated. Those readers who are both poetical and musical will, I believe, excuse my dwelling a moment upon a subject which has not, as far as I know, been much considered.

Of our own poets I do not recollect any who have presented musical ideas with such feeling, force, and reality of description, as Milton, and Mr. Mason. When Milton speaks of ---- Notes with many a winding bout Of linked fweetness long drawn out.

L'Allegro.

[•] ΟΡΩΜΕΝΟΙΣ ματλον ή ἀμεομενοις έσικε τα ['Ομηρε] ετοιηματα.

Treatife de Hom. Poef. loco cit^o.

P Lucian, in his Imagines, just now cited, has very happily described a fine semale voice; and he calls the description, somewhat boldly, μακλιφωνίας μαι ώδης ΕΙΚΩΝ. Tom. ii. p. 13. Ed. Bened. Πας δε δ του τε εθεγματω. π. τ. αλ.

And of—" a foft and folemn-breathing found," that Rose like a steam of rich distill'd persumes,

And stole upon the air.

Comus.

Who, that has a truly mufical ear, will refuse to confider such description as, in some fort, imitative?

In the same spirit both of Poetry and of Music are these beautiful lines in CARACTACUS, addressed by the Chorus to the Bards:

Ye, whose skill'd fingers know how best to lead,
Through all the maze of found, the wayward step
Of Harmony, recalling oft, and oft Permitting her unbridled course to rush
Through dissonance to concord, sweetest then Ev'n when expected harshest.—

It feems fcarce possible to convey with greater clearness to the ear of imagination the effect of an artful and well-conducted harmony; of that free and varied range of modulation, in which the ear is ever wandering, yet never lost, and of that masterly and bold intertexture of discord, which leads the sense to pleasure, through paths that lie close upon the very verge of pain.

The general and confused effect of complex and aggregated found may be said to be described, when the most striking and characteristic of the single sounds of which it is compounded are selected and enumerated; just as single sounds are described (and they can be described no otherwise) by the selection of their principal qualities, or modifications.—I cannot produce a finer example of this than the following admirable passage of Dante, in which, with a force of representation peculiar to himself in such subjects, he describes the mingled terrors of those distant sounds that struck his ear as he entered the gates of his imaginary Inservo;—" si mise dentro alle segrete cose."—

4 See also Il Penseroso, 161-166.

Quivi sospiri, pianti, ed alti guai Risonavan per l'aer senza stelle;

Diverse lingue, orribili favelle, Parole di dolore, accenti d'ira, Voci alte fioche, e fuon di man con elle.

Inferno, Canto III.

The reader may be glad to relieve his imagination from the terrible ENAPPEIA of this description, by turning his ear to a far different combination of sounds;—to the charming description of "the melodies of morn," in the Minstrel, or of the melodies of evening in the Deserted Village:

Sweet was the found, when oft at evening's close,
Up yonder hill the village murmur rose.
There as I past with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came soften'd from below;
The swain responsive as the milk-maid sung,
The sober herd that low'd to meet their young;
The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school;
The watch-dog's voice that bay'd the whisp'ring wind,
And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind.
These all in soft consusion sought the shade,
And fill'd each pause the nightingale had made'.

But

- Book I. Stanzas 40, 41.
- ⁵ The following Stanza of Spenfer has been much admired:

The joyous birdes, shrouded in cheareful shade, Their notes unto the voice attempred sweet, Th' angelical soft trembling voices made To th' instruments divine, respondence meet; The silver-sounding instruments did meet With the base murmur of the water's fall; The water's fall with difference discreet Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call; The gentle warbling wind low answered to all.

Fairy Queen, Book II. Canto 12, Stanza 71.

Dr.

But fingle founds may also be so described or characterized as to produce a secondary perception, of sufficient clearness to deserve the name of imitation. It is thus that we hear the "far-off" Curfeu" of Milton;

Over fome wide-water'd shore Swinging slow with fullen roar'.

And Mr. Mason's "Bell of Death," that pauses now; and now with rifing knell Flings to the hollow gale its fullen found.

Elegy III.

I do not know a happier descriptive line in Homer than the following, in his simile of the nightingale:

Dr. Warton fays of these lines, that they "are of themselves a complete concert "of the most delicious music." It is unwillingly that I differ from a person of so much taste. I cannot consider as Music, much less as "delicious music," a mixture of incompatible sounds, if I may so call them—of sounds musical with sounds unmusical. The singing of birds cannot possibly be "attempred" to the notes of a human voice. The mixture is, and must be, disagreeable. To a person listening to a concert of voices and instruments, the interruption of singing-birds, wind, and waterfalls, would be little better than the torment of Hogarth's enraged musician.—Farther—the description itself is, like too many of Spenser's, coldly elaborate, and indiscriminately minute. Of the expressions, some are seeble and without effect—as, "joyous birds;" some evidently improper—as, "trembling voices," and "cheareful "shade;" for there cannot be a greater fault in a voice than to be tremulous; and cheareful is surely an unhappy epithet applied to shade; some cold and laboured, and such as betray too plainly the necessities of rhyme; such is,

" The water's fall with difference differect."

• The reader who conceives the word "fivinging," to be merely descriptive of metion, will be far, I think, from seeling the whole force of this passage. They who are accussomed to attend to founds, will, I believe, agree with me, that the found, in this case, is affected by the motion, and that the swing of a bell is assually heard in its time, which is different from what it would be if the fame bell were struck with the fame force, but at rest. The experiment may be casely made with a small hand-bell.

Ήτε θαμα τρωπωσα χεει σολυηχεα φωνην ".

That which is peculiar in the finging of this bird, the variety, richneis, flexibility, and liquid volubility of its notes, cannot well be more strongly characterized, more audibly presented to the mind, than by the $\pi \circ \lambda \cup \eta \chi \in \alpha$, the $\chi \in \alpha$, and, above all, the $\theta \alpha \mu \alpha \tau \in \alpha$, of this short description π . But, to return—

I mentioned also, description of mental objects; of the emotions, passions, and other internal movements and operations of the mind. Such objects may be described, either immediately, as they affect the mind, or through their external and sensible effects. Let us take the passion of Dido for an instance:

At regina gravi jamdudum faucia curà Vulnus alit venis, et cœco carpitur igni, &c.

Æneid IV. 1.

This is immediate description.—But when Dido

Incipit effari, mediaque in voce refiftit;
Nunc eadem, labente die, convivia quærit,
Iliacosque iterum, demens, audire labores
Exposcit, pendetque iterum narrantis ab ore.
Post, ubi digressi, lumenque obscura vicissim
Luna premit, suadentque cadentia sidera somnos,

- * Odyssey, T. 521. I am surprised at Ernestus's interpretation of $\tau_{\zeta}\omega\pi\omega\sigma\alpha$; i. e. "de luscinià inter canendum se versante;" [Index to his Homer.] by which the greatest beauty of the description would be lost; and lost without necessity: for the natural construction is that which Hest chius gives: $\tau_{\zeta}\omega\pi\omega\sigma\alpha$ — $\tau_{\zeta}\varepsilon\pi\varepsilon\sigma\alpha$ THN $\Phi\Omega$ NHN.
- * Not a fingle beauty of this line is preferved in Mr. Pope's translation. The χειι, " pours her voice," is entirely dropt; and the strong and rich expression, in θαμα τρωπωτα, and πελιτιχεα, is diluted into " varied strains." [Book xix. 607.] For the particular ideas of a variety of quick turns and inflexions [θαμα τρωπωτα] and a variety of tones, [ποτυπχεα] the translator has substituted the general, and therefore weak idea, of variety in the abstract—of a song or "strains" simply varied. The reader may see this subject—the importance of particular and determinate ideas to the sorce and beauty of description—admirably il ustrated in the Discourse on Poetical Imitation. [Hurd's Horace, vol. iii. p. 15—19.]

Sola domo mœret vacuâ, stratisque relictis Incubat.

-here, the passion is described, and most exquisitely, by its fensible effects. This, indeed, may be confidered as falling under the former kind of descriptive imitation—that of sensible objects. There is this difference, however, between the description of a fensible object, and the description of a mental—of any passion for example—through that of a fenfible object, that, in the former, the description is confidered as terminating in the clear and distinct representation of the sensible object, the landscape, the attitude, the found, &c.: whereas in the other, the fensible exhibition is only, or chiefly, the means of effecting that which is the principal end of fuch description—the emotion, of whatever kind, that arises from a strong conception of the passion itself. The image carries us on forcibly to the feeling of its internal cause. When this first effect is once produced, we may, indeed, return from it to the calmer pleafure, of contemplating the imagery itself with a painter's eye.

It is undoubtedly, this description of passions and emotions, by their sensible effects, that principally deserves the name of imitative; and it is a great and sertile source of some of the highest and most touching beauties of poetry. With respect to immediate descriptions of this kind, they are from their very nature, far more weak and indistinct, and do not, perhaps, often posses that degree of forcible representation that amounts to what we call imitative description.—But here some distinctions seem necessary. In a strict and philosophical view, a single passion or emotion does not admit of description at all. Considered in itself, it is a simple internal sceling, and, as such, can no more be described, than a simple idea can be desired. It can be described no otherwise than in its exects, of some kind or other. But the effects of a passion are of two kinds, internal and external. Now, y See the Discourse on Poetical Imitation, of Dr. Hurd, p. 39, &c.

popularly speaking, by the passion of love, for example, we mean the whole operation of that passion upon the mind—we include all its internal workings; and when it is described in these internal and invisible effects only, we consider it as immediately described; these internal effects being included in our general idea of the passion. Mental objects, then, admit of immediate description, only when they are, more or less, complex; and such description may be considered as more or less imitative, in proportion as its impression on the mind approaches more or less closely to the real impression of the passion or emotion itself.—Thus, in the passage above referred to as an instance of such immediate description, the mental object described is a complex object—the passion of love, including some of its internal effects; that is, some other passions or feelings which it excites, or with which it is accompanied:

At regina gravi jamdudum faucia curâ

Vulnus alit venis, et cœco carpitur igni.

Multa viri virtus animo, multufque recurfat

Gentis honos: hærent infixi pectore vultus,

Verbaque: nec placidam membris dat cura quietem.

Æn. IV. initio.

Reduce this passage to the mere mention of the passion itself—the simple feeling or emotion of love, in the precise and strict acceptation of the word, abstractedly from its concomitant effects, it will not even be description, much less imitative description. It will be mere attribution, or predication. It will say only—"Dido was in love."

Thus, again, a complication of different passions admits of forcible and imitative description:

Imo in corde pudor, mixtoque infania luctu, Et furiis agitatus amor, et conscia virtus.

An. XII. 666.

Here, the mental object described is not any single passion, but the complex passion, if I may call it so, that results from the mixture and sermentation of all the passions attributed to Turnus.

To give one example more:—The mind of a reader can hardly, I think, be flung into an imaginary fituation more closely refembling the real fituation of a mind distressed by the complicated movements of irresolute, fluctuating and anxious deliberation, than it is by these lines of Virgil:

Atque animum nunc huc celerem, nunc dividit illuc, In partesque rapit varias, perque omnia versat.

Æn. VIII. 19.

It may be necessary, also, for clearness, to observe, that description, as applied to mental objects, is sometimes used in a more loose and improper sense, and the Poet is said to describe, in general, all the passions or manners which he, in any way, exhibits; whether, in the proper sense of the word, described, or merely expressed; as, for example, in the lines quoted from the opening of the south book of the Æneid, the passion of Dido is described by the Poet. In these——

Quis novus hic nostris successit sedibus hospes?

Quam sese ore ferens!—quam forti pectore et armis!——

—it is expressed by herself. But is not this, it may be asked, still imitation? It is; but not descriptive imitation. As expressive of passion, it is no farther imitative, than as the passion expressed is imaginary, and makes a part of the Poet's sietion: otherwise, we must apply the word imitative, as nobody ever thought of applying it, to all cases in which we are made, by sympathy, to feel strongly the passion of another expressed by words. The passage is, indeed, also imitative in another view—as dramatic. But for an explanation of both these heads of imitation, I must refer to what follows.—I shall only add, for fear of mistake, that there is also, in the second of those lines, descriptive imitation; but descriptive of Eneas only; not of Dido's passion, though it strongly indicates that passion.—All I mean to affert is, that those lines are not descriptive imitation of a mental object.

So much, then, for the subject of descriptive imitation, which has, perhaps, detained us too long upon a single point of our general inquiry.

3. The word imitation is also, in a more particular, but well-known, sense, applied to Poetry when considered as fiction—to stories, actions, incidents, and characters, as far as they are feigned or invented by the Poet in imitation, as we find it commonly, and obviously enough, expressed, of nature, of real life, of truth, in general, as opposed to that individual reality of things which is the province of the historian. Of this imitation the epic and dramatic poems are the principal examples.

That this fense of the term, as applied to siction, is entirely distinct from that in which it is applied to description, will evidently appear from the following confiderations.—In descriptive imitation, the refemblance is between the ideas raifed, and the actual impressions, whether external or internal, received from the things themselves. In fictive imitation, the resemblance is, strictly speaking, between the ideas raised, and other ideas; the ideas raised —the ideas of the Poem—being no other than copies, refemblances, or, more philosophically, new, though fimilar, combinations of that general flock of ideas, collected from experience, observation, and reading, and reposited in the Poet's mind.—In description, imitation is opposed to actual impression, external or internal: in fiction, it is opposed to fast.—In their effects, some degree of illusion is implied; but the illusion is not of the same kind in both. Defcriptive imitation may be faid to produce illusive perception,fictive, illusive belief.

^{*} Mob — γογ Φ φειδης ΕΙΚΟΝΙΖΩΝ ΤΗΝ ΑΛΗΘΕΙΑΝ.—Suidas, & Hefychius, voce Mob ...

Farther—descriptive imitation may subsist without fictive, and fictive, without descriptive. The first of these affertions is too obvious to stand in need of proof. The other may require some explanation. It feems evident that fiction may even fubfift in mere nerration, without any degree of description, properly so called; much more, without fuch description as I have called imitative; that is, without any greater degree of refemblance to the things expressed, than that which is implied in all ideas, and produced by all language, confidered merely as intelligible. Let a story be invented, and related in the plainest manner possible; in short and general expressions, amounting, in the incidents, to mere affertion, and in the account of passions and characters, as far as possible, to mere attribution: this, as fiction, is still imitation,—an invented resemblance of real life, or, if you please, of history ,-though without a fingle imitative description, a fingle picture, a fingle instance of strong and visible colouring, throughout the whole ". I mean, by this, only to shew the distinct and independent senses in which imitation is applied to description and to fiction, by flewing how each species of imitation may subsist without the other: but, that fictive imitation, though it does not, in any degree, depend on descriptive for its existence, does, in a very great degree, depend on it for its beauty, is too obvious to be called in question L z " Historiæ imitatio ad placitum." Bacon, De augm. Scient. lib. ii. c. 13.

The

² The Æncid, in this view, is equally imitation in every part where it is not, or is not supposed to be, historically true; even in the simplest and barest narration. In point of fiction, "tres littore cervos prospicit errantes," is as much imitation, though not as pectical, as the fine description of the storm in the same book, or of Dido's conflicting passions, in the sourth.

b Yet even here a diffinction obviously suggests itself. A work of siction may be considered in two views; in the whole, or in its parts: in the general story, the Medo, said the formers, &c. or, in the detail and circumstances of the story, the account of such places, person, and things, as the sable necessarily involves. Now,

The two fenses last mentioned of the word imitative, as applied to description, and to siction, are manifestly extended, or improper senses, as well as that first mentioned, in which it is applied to language considered as mere found. In all these imitations, one of the essential conditions of whatever is strictly so denominated is wanting;—in sonorous imitation, the resemblance is immediate, but not obvious; in the others, it is obvious, but not immediate; that is, it lies, not in the words themselves, but in the ideas which they raise as signs: yet as the circumstance of obvious resemblance, which may be regarded as the most striking and distinctive property of Imitation, is here found, this extension of the word seems to have more propriety than that in which it is applied to those faint and evanescent resemblances which have, not without reason, been called the echo of found to sense.

4. There feems to be but one view in which Poetry can be confidered as Imitation, in the strict and proper fense of the word. If we look for both immediate and obvious resemblance, we shall in the first view, nothing farther seems requisite to make the fictive imitation good, than that the events be, in themselves, important, interesting, and affecting, and so connected as to appear credible, probable, and natural to the reader, and, by that means, to produce the illusion, and give the pleasure, that is expected:—and this purpose may be answered by mere narration. But in the detail this is not the case. When the Poet proceeds to fill up and distend the outline of his general plan by the exhibition of places, characters, or passions, these also, as well as the events, must appear probable and natural: but, being more complex objects, they can no otherwise be made to appear so than by some degree of description, and that description will not be good description, that is, will not give the pleasure expected from a work of imagination, unless it be imitative—such as makes us see the place, seel the passion, enter thoroughly into the character described. Here, the station intest cannot produce its proper essential therefore cannot be considered as good, without the assistance of descriptive.

[•] See above, p. 5.

Pope's Essay on Crit. 365.—Indeed, what Ovid says of the nymph Echo [Wet. iii. 358.] may be applied to this echo of imitative words and construction:—Nec prior spsa loqui didicit. The sense of the words must speak first.

find it only in DRAMATIC—or to use a more general term—PER-SONATIVE Poetry; that is, all Poetry in which, whether effentially or occasionally, the Poet personates; for here, speech is imitated by speech°. The difference between this, and mere narration or description, is obvious. When, in common discourse, we relate, or describe, in our own persons, we imitate in no other fense than as we raise ideas which resemble the things related or But when we speak as another person, we become mimics, and not only the ideas we convey, but the words, the discourse itself, in which we convey them, are imitations; they refemble, or are supposed to resemble, those of the person we reprefent. Now this is the cafe not only with the Tragic and Comic Poet, but also with the Epic Poet, and even the Historian, when either of these quits his own character, and writes a speech in the character of another person. He is then an imitator, in as strict a fense as the personal mimic.—In dramatic, and all personative Poetry, then, both the conditions of what is properly denominated Imitation, are fulfilled.

And now, the question—" in what senses the word Imitation "is, or may be applied to Poetry,"—seems to have received its answer. It appears, I think, that the term ought not to be extended beyond the four different applications which have been mentioned; and that Poetry can be justly considered as imitative, only by found, by description, by sietion, or by personation. Whenever the Poet speaks in his own person, and, at the same time, does not either seign, or make "the sound an echo to the sense," or stay to impress his ideas upon the fancy with some degree of that sorce and distinctness which we call description, he cannot,

The drama, indeed, is faid also to imitate action by action; but this is only in actual representation, where the players are the immediate imitators. In the poem its Is nothing but words can be immediately copied. Gravina says well, Non è imitazione fortica quella, che non è satta dalle parole.—[Della Trag. sect. 13.] in any fense that I am aware of, be said to imitate; unless we extend imitation to all speech—to every mode of expressing our thoughts by words—merely because all words are signs of ideas, and those ideas images of things.

It is fcarce necessary to observe, that these different species of imitation often run into, and are mixed with, each other. They are, indeed, more properly fpeaking, only fo many diffinct, abstracted views, in which Poetry may be considered as imitating. It is feldom that any of them are to be found feparately; and in fome of them, others are necessarily implied. Thus, dramatic imitation implies fiction, and fonorous imitation, description; though converfely, it is plainly otherwife. Descriptive imitation is, manifestly, that which is most independent on all the others. The passages in which they are all united are frequent; and those in which all are excluded, are, in the best Poetry, very rare: for the Poet of genius rarely forgets his proper language; and that can fearcely be retained, at least while he relates, without more or less of colouring, of imagery, of that descriptive force which makes us fee and hear. A total fuspension of all his functions as an imitator is hardly to be found, but in the simple proposal of his fubject, in his invocation, the expression of his own sentiments, or, in those calm beginnings of narration where, now and then, the Poet stoops to fast, and becomes, for a moment, little more than a metrical historian k.

f See Hermes, Book iii. ch. 3, p. 329, &c. And Part II. of this Diff. note 1.

2	Arma virumque cano, Trojæ qui primus ab oris
	Italiam, fato profugus, Lavinaque venit
	Litora.	Eneid, I.
ħ	Musa, mihi causas memora, &c.	Ibid.
i	Tantæne animis cælestibus iræ?
	Tantæ molis erat Romanam condere gentem.	Ilid.
k	Urbs antiqua fuit, (Tyrii tenuêre coloni,) Carthago, Italiam contra, Tiberinaque longe
	Ostia, &c.	Mid.

The

The full illustration of all this by examples, would draw out to greater length a discussion, which the reader, I fear, has already thought too long. If he will open the Æneid, or any other epic poem, and apply these remarks, he may, perhaps, find it annuling to trace the different kinds of imitation as they successively occur, in their various combinations and degrees; and to observe the Post varying, from page to page, and sometimes even from line to line, the quantity, if I may so speak, of his imitation; sometimes this time, and sometimes, though rarely and for a moment, throwing off all gether, his imitative form.

It has been often faid that ALL Poetry is Imitation. But from the preceding inquiry it appears, that, if we take Poetry in its common acceptation, for all metrical composition, the affertion is not true; not, at least, in any sense of the term Imitation but such as will make it equally true of all Speech. If, on the other hand, we depart from that common acceptation of the word Poetry, the affertion that "all Poetry is Imitation," seems only an improper and confused way of saying, that no composition that is not imitative ought to be called Poetry. To examine the truth of this, would be to engage in a fresh discussion totally distinct from the object of this differtation. We have not, now, been considering what Poetry is, or how it should be defined; but only, in what sense it is an Imitative Art: or, rather, we have been examining the nature and extent of VERBAL IMITATION in general.

¹ This expression is nowhere, that I know of, used by Aristotle. In the beginning of his treatise he afferts only that the Epic, Tragic, Comic, and Dithyramkic Poems are imitations. Le Bossu, not content with saying that "every fort of Poem in general is an "imitation," goes so far as even to alter the text of Aristotle in his marginal quotation. He makes him say, ΠΟΙΗΣΕΙΣ πασαι τυγχανεστν έσαι μιμησεις το συνολον.

m See p. 23, note f.

n Imitation, in every fense of the word that has been mentioned, is manifestly independent on metre, though being more eminently adapted to the nature and end of metrical composition, it has thence been peculiarly denominated Poetic imitation, and attributed to the Poetic Art.

II.

THE preceding general inquiry, "in what fenses the word Imi"tation is, or may be, applied to Poetry," brings us with some advantage to the other question proposed, of more immediate concern to the reader of this treatise of Aristotle,—" in what senses it "was so applied by HIM."

- I. It is clearly so applied by him in the sense which, from him, has, I think, most generally been adopted by modern writers—that of FICTION, as above explained, whether conveyed in the dramatic or personative form, or by mere narration in the person of the Poet himself. This appears from the whole sixth section of Part II. [of the original, ch. ix.] but especially from the last paragraph, where he expressly says, that what constitutes the Poet an imitator, is the invention of a sable: wountry μαλλον ΤΩΝ ΜΥΘΩΝ ἐναι δα ΠΟΙΗΤΗΝ ὁσω ωοιητης ΚΑΤΑ ΜΙΜΗΣΙΝ ἐςι μιμαται δε ΤΑΣ ΠΡΑΞΕΙΣ. He repeatedly calls the sable, or Μυθω, " an imitat" tion of an action;" but this it can be in no other sense than as it is seigned, either entirely, or in part. A history, as far, at least, as it is strictly history, is not an imitation of an action.
- 2. It feems equally clear, that he confidered DRAMATIC Poetry as peculiarly imitative, above every other species. Hence his first rule concerning the epic or narrative imitation, that its fable "should be dramatically constructed, like that of tragedy ":"— τες μυθες, καθαπερ έν ταις τραγωδιαις, ΔΡΑΜΑΤΙΚΟΥΣ:—his praise of Homer for "the dramatic spirit of his imitations:"—έτι και ΜΙΜΗΣΕΙΣ ΔΡΑΜΑΤΙΚΑΣ ἐποιησε ": and above all, the remarkable expression he uses, where, having laid it down as a precept that a P. 19.

^b μιμεισθαι έςιν — ώς ΤΟΝ ΑΥΤΟΝ και ΜΗ ΜΕΤΑΒΑΛΑΟΝΤΑ. cap. 3. " The composition of the Poet may imitate, &c.—or, in his oven perfon throughout, without change." Part I. Sect. 4.

See Mr. Harris, Philol. Inq. p. 139. 4 Part III. Sect. 1. Of the orig. ch, xxiii.

^{*} Part. I. Sect. 6. Orig, cap. iv.

the epic Poet "fhould speak as little as possible in his own person," (ATTON δει του στοιητην ελαχιζα λεγειν) he gives this reason— ΟΥ γαρ έςι κατα ταυτα ΜΙΜΗΤΗΣ: " for he is not then the 1M1-"TATOR ." But, he had before expressly allowed the Poet to be an imitator even while he retains his own person 8. I see no. other way of removing this apparent inconfiftence, than by fuppoling him to fpeak comparatively, and to mean no more, than that the Poet is not then truly and strictly an imitator h; or, in other words, that imitation is applicable in its firit and proper fense, only to personative poetry, as above explained; to that Poetry in which speech is represented by speech, and the resemblance, as in painting and fculpture, is immediate. I am not confcious that I am here forcing upon Aristotle a meaning that may not be his. I feem to be only drawing a clear inference from a clear fact. cannot be denied, that, in the passages alleged, he plainly speaks. of personative Poetry as that which peculiarly deserves the name of imitation. The inference feems obvious—that he speaks of it as peculiarly imitative, in the only fense in which it is so, as being the only species of Poetry that is strictly imitative.

I do not find in Aristotle any express application of the term except these two. Of the other two senses in which Poetry may be, and by modern writers has been, considered as imitation—resemblance of sound, and description—he says nothing.

[†] Part III. Sect. 3. Orig. cap. 24.

^E See above note ^b.

With.

So Victorius: "amittit pené eo tempore nomen Poetæ." Castelvetro's solution of this difficulty is the same; and I find his ideas of this matter so coincident with my own, that I am induced to transcribe his words: In his comment upon the passage, he says, speaking of the dramatic part of epic poetry, "Si domanda qui solo "rassomigliativo, (i. e. imitative) non perché ancora quando il Poeta narra senza introducimento di persone à savellare, non rassomigli, ma perché le parole diritte poste in luogo di parole diritte, segurano, rappresentano, et rassomigliano meglio le parole, "che le parole poste in luogo di cose non figurano, non rappresentano, non rassomi-

[&]quot; gliano le cose; in guisa che, in certo modo si puo dire che il rappresentare parole con

[&]quot; parole sia rassomigliare; e il rappresentare cese con parole non sia rassomigliare, [&]quot; paragonando l'un rassomigliare con l'altro, & non semplicemente." P. 554.

With respect, indeed, to the former of these, fonorous imitation, it cannot appear in any degree furprifing that he should pass it over in total filence. I have already observed, that even in a general inquiry concerning the nature of the imitation attributed to Poetry, it is by no means that fense of the word which would be likely first to occur; and it would, perhaps, never have occurred at all, if, in fuch inquiries, we were not naturally led to compare Poetry with Painting, and other arts firitly imitative, and as naturally led by that comparison to admit sonorous imitation as one species, from its agreement with those strictly imitative arts in the circumstance of immediate resemblance. But no such general inquiry was the object of Aristotle's work, which is not a treatise on Poetic Imitation, but on Poetry. His subject, therefore, led him to confider, not all that might without impropriety be denominated imitation in Poetry, but that imitation only which he regarded as effential to the art; as the fource of its greatest beauties, and the foundation of its most important rules. With respect, then, to that cafual and subordinate kind of imitation which is produced merely by the found of words, it was not likely even that the idea of it should occur to him. Indeed, it is to be considered as a property of language in general, rather than of Poetry; and of speech—of actual pronunciation—rather than of language^k. Befides that the beauties arising from this fource are of too delicate and fugitive a nature to be held by rule. They must be left to the ear of the reader for their effect, and ought to be left to that of the Poet for their production.

But neither does Aristotle appear to have included description in his notion of Poetic imitation; which, as far as he has explained it, seems to have been simply that of the imitation of human actions, manners, passions, events, &c. in feigned story; and that, principally, when conveyed in a dramatic form. Of description, indeed, important as it is to the beauty of Poetry in general, and to that of fiction itself, more particularly in the epic form, he has not said one word throughout his treatise: so far was he from extending Poetic imitation, as some have done, to that general sense which comprehends all speech.

i See above p. 3. k See above, p. 5.

But here, to avoid confusion, the sense in which I have used the term description must be kept in view. When it is said that Aristotle "did not include description in his notion of imitation," it is not meant, that he did not consider the descriptive parts of narrative Poetry as in any respect imitative. The subject of a description may be either real, or seigned. Almost all the descriptions of the higher Poetry, the Poetry of invention, are of the latter kind. These Aristotle, unquestionably, considered as imitation; but it was as siction, not as description;—as salsehood resembling truth, or nature, in general, not as verbal expression resembling, by its force and clearness, the visible representations of painting, or the perception of the thing itself. Had he considered description in this sense as imitation, he must necessarily have admitted imitation without siction. But this seems clearly contrary

¹ Thus I. C. Scaliger, Poet. lib. vii. eap. 2. "Denique imitationem effe in "OMNI SERMONE, quia verba funt imagines rerum." He is followed by If. Cafaubon; De Rom. Satirâ, cap. v. p. 340. Both these acute critics dispute warmly, against Aristotle's principle, that the essence of Poetry is imitation. And they are, undoubtedly, so far in the right, that if, as they contend, the only proper sense of Poetry is that in which it is opposed to prose ("omnom metro astrictam orationem et posse et debere Poema dici." Cas. ubi sup.) then, there can be no other imitation common to all Poetry, than that which is common to all speech. See above, p. 22, 23.

m It is obvious, that, if the imitation attributed to description consists in the clear and distinct image of the object described, every description conveying such an image to the mind must be equally considered as imitative, whether that object be real, or imaginary; that is, whether the imitation be of individual, or general nature; just as in painting, a portrait, or a landscape from nature, is as much imitation, as an historical figure, or an ideal scene of Claude Lorrain, though certainly of an inferior kind. Indeed, that which presents a real, sensible, and precise object of comparison, may even be said to be more obviously and properly imitation, than that which refers trary to the whole tenor of his treatife. The beauty, indeed, of fuch description was well known to the antients, and frequent examples of it are to be found in their best writers—their orators us, for its original, to a vague and general idea.—It may be objected, that this will extend imitation to all exact description; and it may be asked, whether every such description, of a building, or of a machine, for instance, is to be called an imitation? I answer, that descriptions may be too exact to be imitative; too detailed and minute to prefent the whole strongly, as a picture. Technical descriptions are such. They may be faid to describe every part without describing the whole. To give a complete idea of all the parts, for the mere purpose of information, and to give a strong and vivid general idea in order to please the imagination, are very different things. It is by felsetion, not by enumeration, that the latter purpose is to be effected. [See Dr. Beattie's Effay on Poetry and Music, part I. ch. 5. fect. 4.]—I believe it will be found, on examination, that every description, whatever be its purpose, or its subject, which does actually convey such a lively and distinct idea of the whole of any object, affords fome degree of pleasure to the imagination, and is, so far, imitative; but whether it affords fuch a degree of that pleafure, or whether it be fuch in other respects, as to amount, on the whole, to what may properly be called Poetical imitation, is another question. I must again remind the reader, that the object of this Differtation is to inquire in what fenfes the word imitation is applied to language in general—not to examine all the requifites of fuch imitation as deferves the name of POETRY. Though it has been faid that all Poetry is imitation, it has never, I think, been faid that all imitation is Poetry—See above, p. 20, and note a.

What I faid above, of the difference between the description of all the parts, or circumstances, and the description of the whole by the selection of those parts or circumstances which are most striking, and characteristic of the thing described, may be illustrated by a single description of a machine, in Virgil: I mean the description of a plough in his Georgies.

Continuo in fylvis magnà vi flexa domatur
In burim, & CURVI formam accipit ulmus ARATRI.
Huic ab stirpe pedes temo protentus in octo,
Binæ aures, duplici aptantur dentalia dorfo.
Cæditur & tilia ante jugo levis, altaque sagus,
Stivaque, quæ currus à tergo torqueat imos, &c.

I believe every reader will agree with me that the fecond line of this descriptions conveys, alone, a clearer picture of a plough to the imagination, than all that sollows; which indeed differs little, if we except the metre, from a more technical description in a dictionary of arts.

and.

and historians, as well as Poets; and, particularly, in Homer *. But there is one particular kind of description that may be said to be, in a great measure at least, peculiar to modern times; I mean that which answers to landscape in painting, and of which the subject is, prospects, views, rural scenery, &c. considered merely as pictures—as beautiful objects to the eye. As the truth of this observation may not be readily admitted, and as the subject is eurious, and has not, that I know of, been discussed, the reader will, perhaps, pardon me, if I suffer it to detain us from our direct path, in a digression of some length.

I do not mean to deny that there are some beautiful, though flight, touches of local description to be sound in the antient Poets.

* Indeed, the very existence of an appropriated term, Evagorea, to denote the clearness and visibility of description, would alone surnish a sufficient proof of this, though every work in which it was exemplified had been lost.

+ Descriptions of rural objects in the antient writers, are almost always, what may be called sensual descriptions. They describe them not as beautiful, but as pleasant;—as pleasures, not of the imagination, but of the external senses. Of this kind is the description of a Sicilian scene in the 7th pastoral of Theocritus, from ver. 131 to 146.—Refreshing shades, cool sountains, the singing of birds, sweet smells, boughs laden with fruit, the hum of bees, &c.—all this is charming, but it is not a landscape. [See Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, vol. i. p. 4.] Nor does Virgil paint a landscape, though his reader may paint one for himself, when he exclaims, —— O qui me gelidis in vallibus Hæmi Sistat, & ingenti ramorum protegat umbrå.

Of the same kind is the samous description, in the Phædrus of Plato, of that spot on the banks of the Ilissus to which Socrates and Phædrus retire to read and converse together in the heat of a summer's day. The broad shade of a plane-tree, refreshing breezes, a spring, μαλα ψυχεν εδανω, to cool their fect, and, what is best of all, says Socrates,—(ωαντων πομψετατον) a bed of grass in which they could recline at their ease—these are the materials of the description: not a single allusion to the pleasure of the ene.—We learn from a passage that follows this description, that the country had no charms for Socrates. His apology is curious. He could "learn nothing from fields and trees." Συγγιναταε δη μοι, ω ἀριξε, he says to Phædrus, who had rallied him on that subject, φικομαθης γας έμμι, τα μεν εν χωρια και τα δενδρα έδεν με θεκει διδασκειν, ει δ' εν το άσει είδευπα. Phædrus, p. 230. Ed. Serrani.

But it must be confessed, I think, that they scattered these beauties with a sparing hand, in comparison with that rich prosussion of picturesque ideas which every reader of Poetry recollects in Shak-speare, Milton, Spenser, Thomson, and almost all the modern Poets of any name. Nor can I say that I am able to point out anything of this fort in the most descriptive of the Greek Poets—in Theocritus, or even in Homer—that fairly amounts to such picturesque landscape-description (if I may call it so), as I mean, and as we find so frequently in the Poets just mentioned. In Mr. Pope's Poetical Index to his Homer, we are referred, indeed, to descriptions of "prospects," and "landscapes of a sine country; but, if we turn to the original, we shall seldom, or never, find these landscapes. They are of Mr. Pope's painting; sometimes suggested by a single epithet, as his graffy Pteleon deck'd with chearful greens, The bow'rs of Ceres and the sylvan scenes.

Iliad. II. 850.

One word only of this description is Homer's property, "grassy," $\lambda \epsilon \chi \epsilon \pi o \iota \eta \nu$ ". Many other instances may be found, particularly in his catalogue of the ships, which indeed he professes to have endeavoured to "make appear as much a landscape or piece of "painting as possible." [Obs. on the catalogue.] Sometimes he does more than "open the prospect a little," as he expresses it; he creates it. In his persidious version ("Persida—sed quamvis per-

^{*} II. B. 697. The adjective, graffy, however, is by no means adequate to—λεχεποιην,—i. e. την ποιλειν ποαν έχεσαν και βαθειαν, ένανξη, ἐν ἡ ἐςι και ΛΕΞΑΣΘΑΙ, τετεςι, ΚΟΙΜΗΘΗΝΑΙ. Hefychius.—Hence, probably, Mr. Pope's bewers, &c. A fingle word perfectly equivalent to a fingle word of the original cannot always be found.
In this case, a translator, unwilling to fall short of the Poet's meaning, naturally endeavours to express in more words what be has said in one; but in doing this, he will often be unavoidably reduced to the dilemma, of either misrepresenting the original, if he admits different or additional ideas, or, of weakening it by disfusion, if he does not.

" fida, cara tamen!") " lofty Sefamus invades the fky;" and the river Parthenius

Reflects her bord ring palaces and bowers.

Ib. 1040.

In Homer, the mountain and the river are simply named; not a fingle epithet attends them". In the index to the Odyffey, we find, among other descriptions, one, of "the landfeape about " Ithis has a promiting appearance. Mr. Pope indeed has done his utmost to make a landscape of this description; yet, even his translation, though certainly beautiful, and even picfurefine, will hardly, I believe, be thought to come up to what a modern reader would expect from -" the landfcape about Ithaca." Still lets is this title applicable to the original. All that can be faid of it without exaggeration is, that it is a very pleafing feene, though deferibed, as many things in Homer are deferibed, with that simplicity which leaves a great deal, and may suggest a great deal, to the fancy of the reader. Though it does not answer to the idea given of it in Pope's index, or in the note upon the place, yet it must be allowed to furnish, at least, some good materials for a landicipe; fuch as, a grove', water falling from a rock, and a ruflic altar. If the defeription itself is too simple, short, and general, to be, properly speaking, picturefine description, yet it is fuch as wants nothing, to become to, but a little more colouring of expression, a little more diffinedness and speciality of touch. This, and more than this, Mr. Pope has given it; and that bis

° II. B, 853, 854.

description

^{2 4} It is observable that Homer gives us an exact draught of the country,; he sets 4 before us, as in a filture, the city, &c." Od. Book XVII. note on v. 224.

Thomer's grove is circular; And Harrow KYK VOTPUE, ver. 200. A circumflance rather impledurefque. Mr. Pope knew what to suppress, as well as what to add. He solutions this into a "spersonaling grove."

description is, at least, highly picturesque, will scarce be disputed. Homer gives us simply—" an alter to the nymphs." Pope covers it with moss, and embowers it deep in stades; and in his concluding line, he goes beyond the description of the place, to the description of the religio loci"—of the effect of the place upon the minds of those who approached it.

Beneath, fequester'd to the nymphs is seen

A mossy altar, deep-embower'd in green;

Where constant vows by travellers are paid,

And holy horrors solemnize the shade.

v. 242.

-The additions of Mr. Pope's pencil are distinguished, in the above quotations, by Italies'. But, to prove the inferiority of the Εν δε νομον στιησε απερικου Τ Αμφιγυητις, Εν καλη βησση, μεγαν διων δργουναων, Σταύμες τι, κλισιας τς, κατης ερεας ίδε σηκες.

What I faid of the fimplicity and generality of the description last mentioned, in the Odysley, is exactly applicable to this. Even in his profe-translation of these lines, [Obs. p. 123.] Mr. Pope could not persectly command his fancy. "The divine artist then engraved a large flock of white sheep, feeding along a beautiful valley. Innumerable folds, cottages, and enclosed shelters, were scattered through the prospect." The expressions I have distinguished are Mr. Pope's; their effect on the visibility and distinctors of the picture, I need not point out. The last addition—"feattered through the prospect," is particularly picturesque.—Now, let us turn to his poetic version, and there, indeed, we shall find that finished landscape of which Homer surnished only the simple sketch:

Next this, the eye the art of Vulcan leads Deep through fair forests, and a length of meads; And stalls, and folds, and scatter'd cuts between, And sleep shocks that whiten all the scene.

[·] ___ βωμ - νυμφαων. 2. 210.

Many such additions and improvements the reader will also find in his translation of Homer's description of the shield in the 18th book. To give one remarkable specimen:—I he eleventh compartiment of the shield, he tells us in his Observations on the Shield at the end of that book, is, "an entire landscape without human figures, an image of nature solitary and undisturbed, &c." Let us first view this landscape in the original. Il. Σ . 587.

antients in this species of description, by an accurate and comparative examination of all those passages which are commonly produced as examples of it, would be a task of considerable length, though, I think, of no great difficulty. The few instances here given from Homer are intended rather as illustrations of the difference I meant to point out, than as proofs of the general sact, which I leave to the recollection and the judgment of the reader. To me, I consess, nothing appears more evident.

And may we not account for this defect in antient Poetry, from a fimiliar defect in the fifter art of PAINTING?—For it appears, I think, from all that has been transmitted to us of the history of that art among the antients, that landscape-painting either did not exist, or, at least, was very little cultivated or regarded among the Greeks. In Pliny's account of Grecian artists we find no landscape-painter mentioned; nor anything like a landscape deferibed in his catalogue of their principal works. The first, and the only landscapes he mentions, are those said to be painted in fresco by one Ludius in the time of Augustus; "qui primus in-"stituit amoenissmam parietum picturam;—villas, & porticus, ac "topiaria opera—lucos, nemora, colles,—amnes, littora—varias "ibi obambulantium species, aut navigantium, terrâque villas "adcuntium asellis aut vehiculis, &c."—He likewise painted seaports;—"idemque — maritimas urbes pingere instituit, blan-

[&]quot;The Abbé Winckelmann, eminent for the accuracy of his refearches into every thing relative to the subject of antient arts, gives it as his opinion, that the paintings discovered in the ruins of Herculanum, (four only excepted,) are not older than the times of the Emperors; and he assigns this reason, among others, that most of them are only landscapes:—"Paysages, ports, maisons de campagne, chasses, pêches, vues, & que le premier qui travailla dans ce genre sut un certain Ludio qui vivoit du tems d'Auguste." He adds,—"Les anciens Grees ne s'amusoient pas à peindre des objets inanimés, uniquement propres à rejouir agreablement la vue sans cecuper l'esprit." [Hist. de l'Art chez les Anciens, tome ii. p. 104.] The remark seems just. Men and manners, were the only objects which the Greeks seem to have thought worth regarding, either in painting, or peetry.

"diffino aspectu"." He seems to have been the Claude Lorrain of antient painting. But, that landscape was not, even in Pliny's time, a common and established branch of painting, may perhaps be presumed from the single circumstance of its not having acquired a name. In the passage just quoted, Pliny calls it only, periphrastically, "an agreeable kind of painting, or subject," "amænissiman picturam "." He is not sparing of technical terms upon other occasions; as, rhyparographus, anthropographus, catagrapha, monocromata, &c. With respect to the Greeks, at least, this may be allowed to afford somewhat more than a presumption of the fact.

The Greek Poets, then, did not describe the scenery of nature in a picturesque manner, because they were not accustomed to see it with a painter's eye. Undoubtedly they were not blind to all the beauties of such scenes; but those beauties were not heightened to them, as they are to us, by comparison with painting—with those models of improved and selected nature, which it is the business of the landscape-painter to exhibit. They had no Thomsons, because they had no Claudes. Indeed, the influence of painting, in this respect, not only on Poetry, but on the general taste for the visible beauties of rural nature, seems obvious and indisputable. Shew the most beautiful prospect to [&]quot; Plin. Hift. Nat. xxxv. 10.

^{*} It is remarkable also, that the younger Pliny, where he describes the view from one of his villas, and compares it to a painted landscape, expresses himself, probably for want of an appropriated term, (such as paysage, &c.) by a periphrasis;— formam aliquam ad eximiam pulchritudinem pictam;"—i. e. " a beautiful ideal landscape." Plin. Ep. lib. v. ep. 6.

[‡] I do not know that there is, either in the Greek or Roman language, any fingle term appropriated to express exactly what we mean by a prospect. Pliny, in the epithle referred to in note *, and in the 17th of 2d book, has frequent occasion for such a term, but is obliged to have recourse to circumlocution—regionis forma—regionis situm—facies—facies locorum. "Tot facies locorum totidem senestris & dies stinguit & miscet." [ii. 17.] Ang.—" so many prospects."

a peafant, who never faw a landscape, or read a description: I do not say that he will absolutely feel no pleasure from it; but I will venture to fay, that the pleasure he will feel is very different in kind, and very inferior in degree, compared with that which is felt by a person of a cultivated imagination, accustomed to the representation of such objects, either in painting, or in picturesque Poetry. Such beauty does imitation reflect back upon the object imitated .- What may ferve to confirm the truth of these remarks, is, that from the time of Augustus, when, according to Pliny, landscape-painting was first cultivated, descriptions of prospects, picturesque imagery, and allusions to that kind of painting, seem to have become more common. I do not pretend, however, to have accurately examined this matter. I shall only remind the reader of the acknowledged fuperiority of Virgil in touches of this kind; of Pliny's description of the view from his villa, mentioned above; and of Ælian's description of the Vale of Tempe, and his allusion to painting in the introduction to it².

To return to description in general;—this, as I observed above, Aristotle was so far from including in his notion of imitation, that he is even totally silent concerning it; unless he may be thought slightly to allude to it in one passage, where he recommends it to the Poet to reserve his highest colouring of language for the inactive, that is, the merely narrative, or descriptive, parts of his poem. Several obvious circumstances help to account for this silence. Intent on the higher precepts, and on what he regarded as the more essential beauties of the art—the internal construc-

y "Elegant imitation has strange powers of interesting us in certain views of nature. These we consider but transiently, till the Poet, or Painter, awake our attention, and send us back to life with a new curiosity, which we owe entirely to the copies which they lay before us." Presace to Wood's Essay on Homer, p. 13.

^{*} See above, Part I. note ".

² Έν τοις ΑΡΓΟΙΣ μεςεσι, και μητε ήθικοις, μητε διανουτικοις. Cap. xxiv. Translation, Part III, Sect. 6. See the Note.

tion and contrivance of the fable, the artful dependence and close connection of the incidents, the union of the wonderful and the probable, the natural delineation of character and passion, and whatever tended most effectually to arrest the attention, and secure the emotion, of the spectator or the reader—intent on these, he feems to have thought the beauties of language and expression a matter of inferior confideration, scarce worthy of his attention. The chapters on diction feem to afford some proof of this. manner in which he has treated that subject, will be found, if I mistake not, to bear strong marks of this comparative negligence, and to be, in feveral respects, not such as the reader, from the former parts of the work, would naturally expect b. To this it should be added, that Aristotle's principal object was, evidently, Tragedy. Now in Tragedy, where the Poet himself appears not, where all is action, emotion, imitation—where the fuccession of incidents is close and rapid, and rarely admits those ἀργα μερη, those " idle or inactive parts," of which the philosopher speaks—there is, of course, but little occasion, and little room, for description. It is in the open and extended plan, the varied and digreffive narration, of the Epic form, that the descriptive powers of the Poet have full range to display themselves within their proper province.

I have attempted, in the preceding discussion, to make my way through a subject, which I have never seen treated in a way perfectly clear and satisfactory by others, and which I am therefore far from consident that I have treated clearly myself. I can only hope that I have, at least, left it less embarrassed than I found it.

I shall

b See the NOTES on that part.

Some writers, by imitation understand fiction only: others explain it only by the general term description; and others, again, give it a greater extent, and seem to consider language as imitating whatever it can express. [See above, note 1, and Harris on Music, &c. ch. i.] Some speak of it as the imitation of nature, in general; others

I shall venture, with the same view, to terminate this inquiry by a few remarks on the origin of this doctrine of poetic imitation.

Its history may be sketched in few words.—We find it first in Plato; alluded to in many parts of his works, but no where so clearly and particularly developed, as in the third and tenth books of his Republic. Aristotle followed; applying, and pursuing to its consequences, with the enlarged view of a philosopher and a critic, the principle which his master had considered with the severity of a moral censor, and had described, as we describe an impostor or a robber, only, that being known, it might be avoided.

From these sources, but principally from the treatise of Aristotle, this doctrine was derived, through the later antient, to the latest modern writers. In general, however, it must be confessed, that the way in which the subject has been explained is not such as is calculated to give perfect satisfaction to those fastidious understandings that are not to be contented with anything less than distinct ideas; that, like the sun-dial in the sable, allow of no medium between knowing clearly, and knowing nothing.

Si je ne vois bien clair, je dis-Je n'en sçais rien .

It is one question, in what senses, and from what original ideas, Poetry was first called imitation by Plato and Aristotle; and another, what senses may have suggested themselves to modern writers, who finding Poetry denominated an imitative art, instead feem to confine it to the imitation of la belle nature.—By some writers, the proposition, that "ALL POETRY is imitation," is considered as too plain a point to need any explanation; while others are unable to see why any Poetry, except the dramatic only, should be so denominated. [See Wood's Essay on Homer, p. 240, estave, and the note.]

- d The chief objections of Plato to imitative Poetry, particularly Tragedy, may be feen in the 10th book of his Republic, from ωραττοντας, φαμεν, ἀνθρωπε;—p. 603, C, to ξυμφνω, p. 608, B. Ed. Serrani.
- ^c La Montre et le Quadran, in the ingenious and philosophical fables of La Motte. Livre iii. fab. 2.

of carefully investigating the original meaning of the expression, have had recourse, for its explication, to their own ideas, and have, accordingly, extended it to every sense which the widest and most distant analogy would bear.

With respect to the origin of the appellation—the very idea that Poetry is imitation, may, I think, evidently be traced to the THEATRE as to its natural source; and it may, perhaps, very reasonably be questioned, whether, if the drama had never been invented, Poetry would ever have been placed in the class of Imitative Arts.

That ARISTOTLE drew his ideas of Poetic imitation chiefly from the drama, is evident from what has been already faid. His preference, indeed, of dramatic Poetry, is not only openly declared in his concluding chapter, but strongly marked throughout, and by the very plan and texture of his work. The Epic-that " greatest work," as Dryden extravagantly calls it, " which the " foul of man is capable to perform f," is flightly touched and foon difmiffed. Our eye is still kept on Tragedy. The form and features of the Epic Muse are rather described by comparison with those of her fister, than delineated as they are in themselves; and though that preference which is the refult of the comparison feems justly given on the whole, yet it must, perhaps, be confessed, that the comparison is not completely stated, and that the advantages and privileges of the Epic are touched with fome referve 8. It is, indeed, no wonder, that he, who held imitation to be the effence of Poetry, should prefer that species which, being f Pref. to his Æneid.

For example:—in Part III. fect. 2. [Orig. ch. xxiv.] he had allowed the greater extent of the Epic Poem to give it an advantage over Tragedy in point of variety and magnificence. But, in the comparison between them in his last chapter, this important advantage is entirely passed over, and only the disadvantages of the epic extent of plan are mentioned; its variety, the want of which he had before allowed to be a great defect, and even a frequent cause of ill success, in tragedy, is here stated only as a salut—as want of unity. [See Part V. sect. 3. Orig. cap. xxvi.]

mere strictly imitative, was, in his view, more strictly Poetry, than any other.

With respect to Plato the case is still plainer. In the third book of his Republic, where he treats the fubject most fully, and is most clear and explicit, he is so far from considering "all " Poetry" as imitation, that he expressly distinguishes imitative Poetry from "Poetry without imitation"." Nor does he leave us in any uncertainty about his meaning. His imitative Poetry is no other than that which I have called personative, and which the reader will find clearly and precifely described in the passage referred to i. Imitation, then, he confines to the drama, and the dramatic part of the epic poem; and that, which with Aristotle is the principal, with Plato is the only, sense of imitation applied to Poetry. In short, that Plato drew his idea of the MIMHSIS of Poetry from the theatre itself, and from the personal imitations of represented tragedy, is evident from the manner in which he explains the term, and from the general cast and language of all his illustrations and allusions .- "When the Poet," he says, "quit-" ting his narration, makes any speech in the character of another " perfon, does he not then affimilate, as much as possible, his " language to that of the person introduced as speaking?—Cer-"tainly.—But to affimilate one's felf to another person, either " in voice or GESTURE—is not this to IMITATE that person "?" And in many other passages we find the same allusion to the imitations, by voice and action, of the actor and the rhapfodist; and even to ludicrous mimicry of the lowest kind.

All

h Rep. 3. ed. Ser. p. 393. dueu инипоещь тетогь. and lib. x. p. 605. о инипоеть тетого.

i Rep. 3, from D, p. 392, to D, p. 394. ed. Ser.

^{*} Ανλ ότων γε τινα λεγη όνουν ός τις άλλ \mathfrak{G} ἀν, άρ ου τοτε όμοιεν άυτον φησομεν δτιμαλικα την άυτε λεξιν ένωσφ όν ἀν \mathfrak{w}_{i} σειτή ὡς έρεντα; — Φησομεν τι γας ές: Ουκεν το γε όμοιεν έωυτον άνλφ, ή κατα ΦΩΝΗΝ, ή κατα ΣΠΗΜΑ, μιμεισθαι έκιν έκεινον $\hat{\rho}$ ἀν τις όμοιοι; Rερ. 3, P. 393. cd. Serran.

¹ Ibid. p. 395—κατα ΣΩΜΑ και ΦΩΝΑΣ.—p. 397, εεξις δια μιμησεως ΦΩΝΑΙΣ τε και ΣΣΙΙΜΑΣΙ. The reader may also see p. 396 and 397; in both which places he alludes alludes even to the lowest and most ridiculous kind of mimicry. The passages are to curious and amuting, that the reader will pardon me if I fuffer them, in a note, to lead me into a fhort digression. He speaks in them of imitating, or, as we call it, taking off, "the neighing of horses, and the bellowing of bulls-the found or "thunder, the roaring of the fea and the winds—the tones of the trumpet, the flute, "and all forts of inflruments—the barking of dogs, the bleating of fleep, and the "finging of birds—the rattle of a flower of hail, and the rumbling of wheels."—The fublime Plato was not always fublime. The expressions here are too strong to be understood merely of the imitations of poetical description; they are applicable only to vocal mimiery. Were there any doubt of this, it might be fufficiently removed by other passages of antient authors in which similar feats are recorded. Plutarch, [De aud. Poet. ed. H. Steph. p. 31.] commenting upon Ariftotle's diffinction, Part I. § 5, between the pleasure we receive from the imitation, and that which we receive from the real object, observes, that—"though the grunting of a hog, the rattle " of wheels, the whiftling of the wind, and the roaring of the fea, for instance, are " founds, in themselves offensive and disagreeable, yet when we hear them well and " naturally imitated, they give us pleafure." And he records the names of two eminent performers in this way, Parmeno, and Theodorus; the first of whom possessed the grunt of the hog, and the other the rattle of the wheel, in high perfection.-This Theodorus was, probably, a different person from the tragic after of the same name, whose vocal talents of a higher kind are mentioned by Aristotle in his Rhetoric, (lib. iii. cap. 1.) and who was eminent for the power of accommodating the tone of his voice to the various characters he reprefented. "The voice," fays the philosopher, " of Theodorus appears always to be that of the very person supposed to "fpeak: not so the voices of other actors." In order fully to understand which praise, it is necessary to recollect, that this vocal flexibility in an actor had far greater room to display itself among the antients, than it has with us, on account of the exclusion of women from their stage. Hence one of the objections of Plato to the admission of dramatic Poetry into his Republic: έ δη έπιτρεψομεν ών φαιμεν κηθεσθαι, και δειν ἀυτες ἀνδρας άγαθες γενεσθαι, ΓΥΝΑΙΚΑ ΜΙΜΕΙΣΘΑΙ, ΑΝΔΡΑΣ ΟΝΤΑΣ. μ. τ. αλ. [Rep. 3. p. 395, D.] ---- a paffage which may also serve to confirm what has been afferted, that Plato, in speaking of Poetry as imitation, constantly kept his eye on the personal imitation of the actor or the rhapfodift.—To return to the art of vocal mimicry: the paffages above produced shew it to have been of very respectable antiquity. But there are two other paffages that make it still more venerable; one in the hymn to Apollo attributed to Homer, v. 162, 3, 4,—where the mufical imitations of the Delian virgins are described; (see Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 372.) and another perfonal imitation. It was by no means with the antients as it is with us. Before the multiplication of copies was facilitated by the invention of printing, reading was uncommon. It was not even till long after, that it became, in any degree, the general practice, as it is now. Yet Poetry, we know, among the Greeks, was the common food even of the vulgar. But they beard it only. The philosopher, the critic, and the few who collected books when they could be obtained only by the labour or expence of transcription, might, indeed, take a tragedy or an epic poem into their closets; but, to the generality, all was action, reprefentation, and recital. The tragic, and even the epic poet, were, another very curious passage in the Odyssey, Δ . 279, by which it appears, that the art was practifed even in the Trojan times, and that the beauteous Helen hersels, among her other charms, possessed the talent of vocal mimicry in a degree that would, in modern times, have qualified her to make no inconsiderable figure at Bartholomew-sair. She is described as walking round the wooden horse, after its admission within the walls of Troy, calling, by name, upon each of the Grecian chiefs, and "imitating the voices of their voices."—Harton Agreen Cours loves are described as their voices by answering themselves by answering, or coming out. Anticlus, in particular, would have spoken, if Ulysses had not, by main force, slopped his mouth with his hand, till Minerva came to their relief, and took Helen away.

All this will scarce appear strange or surprising, if we recolled the close connection which then subsisted between poetical and perfonal

- ἀνλ' Οδυσευς ΕΠΙ ΜΑΣΤΑΚΑ ΧΕΡΣΙ ΠΙΕΖΕ
 ΝΩΛΕΜΕΩΣ ΚΡΑΤΕΡΙΗΣΙ, σαωσε δε σιαντας Αχαιες!
 Od. Δ. 287, 8.

A line added in Pope's translation of this pallage, affords a curious example of misapplied ornament:

Firm to his lips his forceful hands apply'd,

Till on his tongue the flutt'ring murmurs dy'd.

B. IV. v. 391.

— one inflance out of many that might be quoted, of the ridiculous effect produced, (especially in the Odyssey,) by continual efforts to elevate what neither should not can be clavated. In the version of the 16th book, (a version approved at least by Mr. Pope) we have this line:

"They reach'd the dome; the dome with marble skin'd. v. 41.

— who would suspect this to be a description of the rule building which Eumœus, " αυτ Φ δειμαθ εεσση ?" [Lib. xiv. 8.] All that is to be found of this marble dome in Homer is a " flow threshold."—παειβη ταινον έδον! v. 41.

in a manner, lost in the actor and the rhapfodist. A tragedy not intended for the stage, would have appeared to the antients as great an absurdity as an ode not written for music. With them, there could be no difficulty in conceiving Poetry to be an Imitative Art, when it was scarce known to them but through the visible medium of arts, strictly and literally, mimetic.

The rhapfodift was defined to be, the actor of an epic Poem. Ραψφδοι—ὑπουριται επων. Ηεγερ.—Ραψφδοι—ὑι τα Ομηςε έπη ἐν ΤΟΙΣ ΘΕΑΤΡΟΙΣ ἀπαγγελλοντες.—Suidas. "Homer's Poems," fays the ingenious and entertaining author of the Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer, "were made to be recited, or fung to a company; "and not read in private, or perufed in a book, which few were then capable of "doing: and I will venture to affirm, that whoever reads not Homer in this view, "loses a great part of the delight he might receive from the Poet."—Blackwell's Enquiry, &c. p. 122.

DISSERTATION II.

ON THE DIFFERENT SENSES OF THE WORD, IMITATIVE, AS APPLIED TO MUSIC BY THE ANTIENTS, AND BY THE MODERNS.

HE whole power of Music may be reduced, I think, to three distinct effects;—upon the ear, the passions, and the imagination: in other words, it may be considered as simply delighting the sense, as raising emotions, or, as raising ideas. The two last of these effects constitute the whole of what is called the moral*, or expressive, power of Music; and in these only we are to look for anything that can be called imitation. Music can be said to imitate, no farther than as it expresses something. As far as its effect is merely physical, and confined to the ear, it gives a simple, original pleasure; it expresses nothing, it resers to nothing; it is no more imitative than the smell of a rose, or the slavour of a pine-apple.

Music can raise ideas, immediately and only by the actual resemblance of its founds and motions to the founds and motions of the thing ^{*} Moral, merely as opposed to physical:—as affecting the mind; not as Ethic, or influencing the manners.

^a Music may raise ideas immediately, by mere association; but I pass over the effects of this principle, (important and powerfulas it is, in Music, as in everything else,) thing fuggested. Such Music we call imitative, in the same sense in which we apply the word to a similar resemblance of sound and motion in poetry. In both cases, the resemblance, though immediate, is so imperfect, that it cannot be seen till it is, in some sort, pointed out; and even when it is so, is not always very evident. Poetry, indeed, has here a great advantage; it carries with it, of necessity, its own explanation: for the same word that imitates by its sound, points out, or hints, at least, the imitation, by its meaning. With Music it is not so. It must call in the affistance of language, or something equivalent to language, for its interpreter.

Of all the powers of Music, this of raising ideas by direct resemblance is confessed to be the weakest, and the least important. It is, indeed, so far from being essential to the pleasure of the art, that unless used with great caution, judgment, and delicacy, as having nothing to do with imitation. If, to raise an idea of any object by casual affociation, be to imitate, any one thing may imitate any other.

I inferted the word, immediately, because Music has also a power of raising ideas, to a certain degree, through the medium of emotions, which naturally suggest correspondent ideas; that is, such ideas as usually raise such emotions. [See Harris, on Music, &c. ch. vi. and below, note s.]

- b See Harris, ibid. ch. ii. where this subject is treated with the author's usual accuracy and clearness.
 - · See Dissert. I.
- d When the idea to be raised is that of a visible object, the imitation of that object by painting, machinery, or other visible representation, may answer the same end.— A visible object strongly characterized by motion, may be suggested by such musical motion as is analogous to it. Thus, a rapid elevation of sounds, bears, or at least is conceived to bear, some analogy to the motion of slame;—but this analogy must be pointed out—"Il saut que l'auditeur soit averti, ou par les paroles, ou par le spectacle, "ou par quelque chose d'equivalent, qu'il doit substituer l'idée du feu à celle du son." See M. Dalembert's Melanges de Literature, vol. v. p. 158,—where the philosophical reader will, perhaps, be pleased with some very ingenious and uncommon observations, on the manner in which the imitative expression even of Music without words, may be influenced by the phraseology of the language in which the hearer thinks.

it will destroy that pleasure, by becoming, to every competent judge, offensive, or ridiculous. It is, however, to Music of this kind only that Mr. Harris, and most other modern writers, allow the word imitative to be applied. The highest power of Music, and that from which "it derives its greatest efficacy," is, undoubtedly, its power of raising emotions. But this is so far from being regarded by them as imitation, that it is expressly opposed to it.

The ideas, and the language, of the antients, on this subject, were different. When they speak of Music as imitation, they appear to have solely, or chiefly, in view, its power over the affections. By imitation, they mean, in short, what we commonly distinguish from imitation, and oppose to it, under the general term of expression. With respect to Aristotle, in particular, this will clearly appear from a few passages which I shall produce from another of his writings; and, at the same time, the expressions made use of in these passages, will help us to account for a mode of speaking so different from that of modern writers on the subject.

What Aristotle, in the beginning of his treatise on Poetry*, calls ΜΙΜΗΣΙΣ—ΙΜΙΤΑΤΙΟΝ- he estewhere, in the same application of it, to Music, calls ΌΜΟΙΩΜΑ—RESEMBLANCE. And he, also, clears up his meaning farther, by adding the thing resem-

Dr. Beattie, On Poetry and Music, p. 138, & passim.—Lord Kaims, El. of Crit. vol. ii. p. 1. Avison, &c.—There is but one branch of this imitation of sound by found, that is really important; and that has been generally overlooked. I mean, the imitation of the tones of speech.—Of this, presently.

^{&#}x27; Harris, On Music, &c. p. 69, 99, 100.

[&]quot;" "If we compare imitation with expression, the superiority of the latter will be condent."—Dr. Beattie, On Poetry and Music, p. 139, 140, &c.—Avison, on Music Expression, Part II. § 3.

^{*} nai the dunnting in wheish, nai nibagishing — pipmoeis.—See Sest. I. of the transfection.

bled or imitated ":— οροιωμα ΤΟΙΣ ΗΘΕΣΙ— ομοιωρατα ΤΩΝ ΗΘΩΝ "
" refemblance to human manners," i. e. difpositions, or tempers; for what he means by these ήθη, he has, likewise, clearly explained by these expressions— ομοιωματα ΟΡΓΗΣ και ΠΡΑΟΤΗΤΟΣ ετι δ'ΑΝΔΡΙΑΣ και ΣΩΦΡΟΣΥΝΗΣ, &c. " refemblances of the irascible and " the gentle disposition—of fortitude and temperance, &c." * This resemblance, he expressly tells us, is " in the rhythm and the " melody:"—ομοιωματα — εν τοις ΡΥΘΜΟΙΣ και τοις ΜΕΛΕΣΙΝ, οργης και ωραστητω. In these passages, Aristotle differs only in the mode of expression from Mr. Harris, when he affirms that " there are sounds to make us chearful or sad, martial or tender, &c." :—from Dr. Beattie, when he says, " Music may inspire " devotion, fortitude, compassion;—may insuje a sorrore, &c." ".

It appears then, in the first place, that Music, considered as affecting, or raising emotions, was called imitation by the antients, because they perceived in it that which is essential to all imitation, and is, indeed, often spoken of as the same thing—resemblance. This h In the same passage he uses the word munner, as synonymous with incommer.

i Arist. de Repub. lib. viii. cop. 5, p. 455, Ed. Duval. Plato uses μησηματα ΤΡΟΠΩΝ in the same sense. De leg. lib. ii. p. 655, Ed. Ser.

k The word, ibn, taken in its utmost extent, includes everything that is habitual and characteristic; but it is often used in a limited sense, for the habitual temper, or disposition. That it is here used in that sense appears from Aristotle's own explanation. I therefore thought it necessary to fix the sense of the word manners, which has the same generality as inde, and is its usual translation, by adding the words "distributions or tempers."

¹ The fame expressions occur in the Problems, SeT. xix. Prob. 29 and 27.

^m Chap. vi.

[&]quot;On Poet. and Mus. p. 167.—In another place Dr. Beattie approaches very near indeed to the language of Aristotle; he says, "After all, it must be acknowledged, "that there is some relation, at least, or analogy, if not similitude, between "certain musical founds, and mental assections, &c." [p. 143.]

^{9 &}quot;Imitations, or refemblances, of fomething elfe." [Enterefor's Inquiry into the Orig. of our Ideas of Beauty, &c. p. 15.] "Taking initation in its proper forth,

This refemblance, however, as bere stated by Aristotle, cannot be immediate; for between founds themselves, and mental affections, there can be no resemblance. The resemblance can only be a resemblance of effect:—the general emotions, tempers, or feelings produced in us by certain sounds, are like those that accompany actual grief, joy, anger, &c.—And this, as far, at least, as can be collected from the passage in question, appears to be all that Aristotle meant.

But, secondly;—the expressions of Music considered in itself, and without words, are, (within certain limits,) vague, general, and equivocal. What is usually called its power over the passions, is, in fact, no more than a power of raising a general emotion, temper, or disposition, common to several different, though related, passions; as pity, love—anger, courage, &c. 4. The effect of words, is, to strengthen the expression of Music, by confining it—by giving it a precise direction, supplying it with ideas, circumstances, and an object, and, by this means, raising it from a calm and general disposition, or emotion, into something approaching, at least, to the stronger feeling of a particular and determinate passion. Now, among the antients, Music, it is well known, was scarce ever heard without this affistance. Poetry and Music were then far from having reached that state of mutual independence, and feparate improvement, in which they have now been long established. When an antient writer speaks of Music, he is, almost always, to be understood to mean vocal Music-Music and Poetry united. This helps greatly to account for the application of the

"as importing a resemblance between two objects." [Lord Kaims, El. of Crit. ch. xviii. § 3.] Imitation, indeed, necessarily implies resemblance; but the converse is not true.

8

P See Dissert. I. first pages.

¹ The expression of Aristotle seems therefore accurate and philosophical. It is everywhere— $\delta\mu\omega\omega\mu\alpha$ H $\Theta\Omega$ N,—not Π A $\Theta\Omega$ N—a resemblance "to manners, or temtempers," not "to passions."

term imitative, by Aristotle, Plato, and other Greek writers, to musical expression, which modern writers oppose to musical imitation. That emotions are raised by Music, independently of words, is certain; and it is as certain that these emotions resemble those of actual passion, temper, &c.—But, in the vague and indeterminate assimilations of Music purely instrumental, though the effect is felt, and the emotion raised, the idea of resemblance is far from being necessarily suggested; much less is it likely, that such resemblance, if it did occur, having no precise direction, should be considered as imitation. Add words to this Music, and the

- This is expressly allowed by Aristotle in the Problem which will presently be produced:—και γας έαν ή ΑΝΕΥ ΛΟΓΟΥ μελ. , όμως έχει ΗΘΟΣ.
- s I observed (Note a.) that Music is capable of raising ideas, to a certain degree, through the medium of those emotions which it raises immediately. But this is an effect fo delicate and uncertain—to dependent on the fancy, the fensibility, the musical experience, and even the temporary difposition, of the heaver, that to call it imitation, is furely going beyond the bounds of all reasonable analogy. Music, here, is not imitative, but if I may hazard the expression, merely suggestive. But, whatever we may call it, this I will venture to fav, - that in the best instrumental Music, expreffively performed, the very indecision itself of the expression, leaving the hearer to the free operation of his emotion upon his fancy, and, as it were, to the free choice of fuch ideas as are, to him, most adapted to react upon and heighten the emotion which occasioned them, produces a pleasure, which nobody, 1 believe, who is able to feel it, will deny to be one of the most delicious that Music is capable of affording. But far the greater part even of those who have an ear for Music, have only an ear; and to them this pleasure is unknown.—The complaint, so common, of the feparation of Poetry and Music, and of the total want of meaning and expression in instrumental Music, was never, I believe, the complaint of a man of true musical feeling: and it might, perhaps, be not unfairly concluded, that Aristotle, who expressly allows that "Music, even without words, has empression," [See the Problem below.] was more of a mufician than his mafter Plato, who is fond of railing at instrumental Music, and asks with Fontenelle, - "Sonate, que me veux tu !- wayχαλεπου, άνευ λογε γιγνομενου έυθμου τε και άρμονιαν γιγιωσκειν, Ό, ΤΙ ΒΟΥΛΕΤΑΙ. De Leg. ii. p. 669. [The flory of Fontenelle is we'l known. - "Je n' oublierai jamais," fays Rouffeau, " la faillie du celebre Fontenelle, qui se trouvant excede de ces eter-" nelles fymphonies, s'ecria tout haut dans un transport d'impatience : Sonate, que me case will be very different. There is now a precise object of comparison presented to the mind; the resemblance is pointed out; the thing imitated is before us. Farther, one principal use of Music in the time of Aristotle, was to accompany dramatic Poetry—that Poetry which is most peculiarly and strictly imitative, and where manners and passions (non new wash) are peculiarly the objects of imitation.

It is, then, no wonder, that the Antients, accustomed to hear the expressions of Music thus constantly specified, determined, and referred to a precise object by the ideas of Poetry, should view them in the light of imitations; and that even in speaking of Music, properly so called, as Aristotle does, they should be led by this affociation to speak of it in the same terms, and to attribute to it powers, which, in its feparate state, do not, in strictness, belong to it. With respect, however, even to the instrumental Music of those times, it should be remembered, that we cannot properly judge of it by our oron, nor suppose it to have been, in that fimple state of the art, what it is now, in its state of separate improvement and refinement. It feems highly probable that the Music of the antients, even in performances merely instrumental, retained much of its vocal style and character, and would therefore appear more imitative than our instrumental Music: and perhaps, after all, a Greek Solo on the flute, or the cithara, was not much more than a fong without the words, embellished here and there with a little embroidery, or a few fprinklings of fimple arpeggio, fuch as the fancy, and the fingers, of the player could fupply.

weak tu?" Diet. de Must.—Sonate.] I would by no means be understood to deny, that there is now, and has been at all times, much unmeaning trash composed for instruments, that would justly provoke such a question. I mean only to say, what has been said for me by a superior judge and master of the art:—" There is "fome kind, even of instrumental Music, so divinely composed, and so expressively "performed, that it wants no words to explain its meaning."—Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 85.

[·] Diff. I.

But there is another circumstance that deserves to be considered. Dramatic Music is, often, strictly imitative. It imitates, not only the effect of the words, by exciting correspondent emotions, but also the words themselves immediately, by tones, accents, inflexions, intervals, and rhythmical movements, similar to those of speech. That this was peculiarly the character of the dramatic Music of the antients, seems highly probable, not only from what is said of it by antient authors, but from what we know of their Music in general; of their scales, their genera, their sondness for chromatic and enharmonic intervals, which approach so nearly to those sliding and unassignable inflexions, (if I may so speak,) that characterize the melody of speech.

I am, indeed, perfuaded, that the analogy between the melody and rhythm of Music, and the melody and rhythm of speech", is a principle of greater extent and importance than is commonly imagined. Some writers have extended it fo far as to refolve into it the whole power of Music over the affections. Such appears to have been the idea of Rousseau. He divides all Music into natural and imitative; including, under the latter denomination, all Music that goes beyond the mere pleasure of the sense, and raises any kind or degree of emotion; an effect which he conceives to be wholly owing to an imitation, more or lefs perceptible, of the accents and inflexions of the voice in animated or passionate fpeech ". Professor Hutcheson was of the same opinion. In his Inquiry concerning Beauty, &c. he fays-" There is also another "charm in Music to various persons, which is distinct from the " harmony, and is occasioned by its raising agreeable passions. " human voice is obviously varied by all the stronger passions "; ω — λεγεται γαρ δη και ΛΟΓΩΔΕΣ ΤΙ ΜΕΛΟΣ, το συγμειμένον έν των ωροσωδίων των έν τοις ὀνομασι. [Ariftox. Harm. i. p. 18. Ed. Meibom.] Το this he opposes—ΜΟΥ-ΣΙΚΟΝ ΜΕΛΟΣ.

w Dict. de Musique, Art. Musique-Melodie, &c.

^{*} Thus Theophrastus, in a curious passage cited by Plutarch in his Sympo-H 2 fiac:,

"now when our car differns any refemblance between the air of a "tune, whether fung, or played upon an inftrument, either in its "time or modulation, or any other circumstance, to the found of the "human voice in any pession, we shall be touched by it in a very "fensible manner, and have melancholy, joy, gravity, thoughtfulness, "excited in us by a fort of sympathy or contagion." [Sect. 6. p. 83.] This ingenious and amiable writer seems to have adopted this opinion from Plato, to whom, indeed, in a similar passage in his System of Moral Philosophy, he refers, and who, in the third book of his Republic, speaks of a warlike melody, inspiring courage, as "imitating the founds and accents of the courageous "man;" and, of a calm and sedate melody, as imitating the founds of a man of such a character."

With respect to ARISTOTLE—whether this was bis opinion, or not, cannot, I think, be determined from anything he has expressly said upon the subject. In the passage above produced *, where so much is said of the resemblance of melody and rhythm fiacs, p. 623, Ed. Xyl.—Μεσικης ἀρχας τρεις ειναι, ΛΥΠΗΝ, ΗΔΟΝΗΝ, ΕΝΘΟΥΣΙΛΣΜΟΝ· ὡς ἐκας ειτων παρατρεποντος ἐκ τε συνηθες και ἐγκλινοιτ την φωτην.—" There "are three principles of Music, grief, love, and enthusiasm; for each of these passions "turns the voice from its usual course, and gives it inflexions different from those of "ordinary speech."—" Il n'y a que les passions qui chantent," says Rousseau; "l'en"tendement ne fait que parler."—This passage of Theophrassus is introduced to resolve the question—In what sense love is faid to teach Music ?—" No wonder," says the resolver, " if love, having in itself all these three principles of Music, grief,

"pleasure, and enthusiasm, should be more prone to vent itself in Music and Poetry
"than any other passion."—Aristoxenus, describing the difference between the two motions of the voice, in speaking and in singing,—(the motion by slides, and that by intervals) says—διοπες, ἐν τρ διακεγεσθαι φευγομεν το is αναι την φωνην, ἀν μη ΔΙΑ ΠΑΘΟΣ ποτε ἐις τοιαυτην κινησιν ἀναγκασθωμεν ἐνθειν.—p. 9. Ed. Meibonii.

y Vol. i. p. 16.

² De Rep. lib. iii. p. 399. Ed. Ser. The expressions are—'n [sc. ἀςμενια—i. e. melody,] εν τη πολεμική πραξει ἐντ۞ ἀνδρειε — πρεποντως ἀν ΜΙΜΗΣΑΙΤΌ ΦΘΟΓΓΟΥΣ ΤΕ ΚΑΙ ΠΡΟΣΩΙΔΙΑΣ.—And again—σωφεονων, ἀνδρειων, ΦΘΟΓΓΟΥΣ ΜΙΜΗΣΟΝΤΑΙ.

^{*} P. 47.

to manners, or tempers, not a word is faid from which it can be inferred, that he meant a refemblance to the tones and accents by which those manners are expressed in speech. On the contrary, the expressions there made use of are such as lead us naturally to conclude, that he meant no more than I have above supposed him to mean; i. e. that the Music produces in us, immediately, feelings refembling those of real passion, &c .- For, after having afferted, that there is "a refemblance in rhythms and melodics to "the irafcible and the gentle disposition," he adds,-" This is "evident from the manner in which we find ourselves affected by "the performance of fuch Music; for we perceive a change pro-"duced in the foul while we liften to it"." And again-" In "melody itself there are imitations of human manners: this is "manifest, from the MELODIES or MODES, which have, evidently, "their distinct nature and character; so that, when we hear them, " we feel ourselves affected by each of them in a different manner. " &c. "-But the passage furnishes, I think, a more decisive

Δηλου δε έκ των έργων ΜΕΤΑΒΑΛΛΟΜΕΝ ΓΑΡ ΤΗΝ ΨΥΧΗΝ άκροωμειοι τοιετων.

Εν δε τοις μελεσ.ν άυτεις έςι μιμηματα των ήθων και τετ' έςι φανεζον ευθυς γαρ ή των Αρμονιων διετημε φυσις· ώτε άμβοντας ΑΛΛΩΣ ΔΙΑΤΙΘΕΣΘΑΙ, μαι μη τον άντον τροπον έχειν προς έμας πν ἀντων. - μ. τ. αλ. - The 'Aquona, i. e. melodies, (or, more properly perhaps, enharmonic melodies) here spoken of, must not be consounded with what are usually called the mides, and described by the writers on antient music, under the denomination of toroi, i. e. pitches, or keys:—these were mere transpositions of the same feale, or festem; the 'Aquanca appear to have been, as the name implies, different melodies—scales, in which the arrangement of intervals, and the divisions of the tetrachord (or genera) were different. Aristides Quintilianus is the only Greek writer who has given any account of these αξμονιαι. (p. 21. Ed. Meib.) He afferts, that it is of these, not of the rever, that Plato speaks in the samous passage of his Republic, lib. iii. where he rejects fome of them, and retains others. This, at least, is clear, that whatever the àcussus of Plato were, Aristotle here speaks of the same. See his Rep. viii. p. 459.—Their distinctive names, Lydian, Dorian, &c. were the fame with those of the rovoi, that of fyntono-Lydian excepted, which, I think, is peculiar to the ἀζμονιαι. This coincidence of names feems to have been the chief cause of the confusion we find in the modern writers on this subject. The distinction has been pointed out in Dr. Burney's Hift. of Mus. vol. i. p. 32.—See also Rousseau's Dick. art. Syntono-Lydien, & Genre.

proof that the refemblance here meant, was not a refemblance to speech. Aristotle afferts here, as in the problem of which I shall presently speak, that, of all that affects the senses, Music alone possesses this property of resemblance to human manners. In comparing it with painting, he observes, that this art can imitate, immediately, only figures and colours; which are not resemblances (ξμεισιματα) of manners and passions, but only signs and indications of them (onuse) in the human body: whereas, in Music, the resemblance to manners "is in the melody itselfe". Now, whatever may be the meaning of this last affertion—for it seems not quite philosophical to talk of such a resemblance as being in the sounds themselves-whatever may be its meaning, it cannot well be, that the melody refembles manners as expressed by speech; because this would destroy the distinction between Music and Painting: for words are exactly in the same case with colours and figures; they are not resemblances of manners, or passions, but indications only. We must then, I fear, be contented to take what Aristotle says as a popular and unphilosophical way of expressing a mere resemblance of effect.

In one of his Musical Problems, indeed, he advances a step farther, and inquires into the cause of this effect of Music upon the mind. The text of these problems is, in general, very incorrect, and often absolutely unintelligible; this problem, however, seems not beyond the reach of secure emendation, though it may, possibly, be beyond that of secure explanation. As it has not, that I know of, been noticed by any writer on the subject, and may be regarded at least as a curiosity not uninteresting to the musical and philosophical reader, I shall venture to give the entire problem, as I think it should be read, and to subjoin a translation.

⁻ ἐκ ἐςι ταυτα ὁμοιωματα των ἀθων, ἀκλα ΣΗΜΕΙΑ μακλον, τα γινομενα σχηματα και χεωματα, των ἡθων· και ταυτα ἐςιν ἐπι τε σωματ⊕ ἐν τοις παθεσιν. — εν δε ΤΟΙΣ ΜΕΛΕΣΙΝ ΑΥΤΟΙΣ ἐςι μιμηματα των ἡθων. —κ. τ. αλ. — p. 455. Ed. Duval.

ΔΙΛ ΤΙ το άκεςον μονον ήθω έχει των αισθητων, (και γαρ έαν ή άνευ λογε μελω, όμως έχει ήθω.) άλλ ε το χρωμα, εδε ή όσμη, εδε ό χυμω, έχει ;— ή, ότι κινησιν έχει μονον; εχ ήν ό ψοφω ήμας κινει τοιαυτη μεν γαρ και τοις άλλοις ύπαρχει κινει γαρ και το χρωμα την όψιν άλλα της επομενης τω τοιετώ ψοφω αισθανομεθα κινησεως άυτη δε έχει όμοιοτητα [τοις ήθεσιν] εν τε τοις βυθμοις και εν τη των φθογγων ταξει των όξεων και βαρεων. (εκ εν τη μίζει άλλ ή συμφωνια εκ έχει ήθω.) Εν δε τοις άλλοις αισθητοις τετο εκ έςιν. άι δε κινησεις άυται σρακτικαι εισιν άι δε ωραξεις ήθες σημασια έςι. [Problem XXVII. of Section 19.]

PROBLEM.

- "Why, of all that affects the fenses, the Audible only has any expression of the manners; (for melody, even without words, has this effect—) but colours, smells, and tastes, have no such property?——Is it because the audible alone affects us by motion?—I do not mean that motion by which as mere found it acts upon the ear; for such motion belongs equally to the objects of our other senses;—thus, colour acts by motion upon the organs of sight, &c.—But I mean another motion which we perceive subsequent to that; and this motion bears a resemblance to human manners, both in the rhythm, and in the arrangement of sounds acute and grave:—not in their mixture; for HARMONY has no expression. With the objects of our other senses this is
- d The text here, in the Ed. of Duval, stands thus:—κινησιν έχει μονονεχι ἡν ὁ ψοφ Φof which no sense can be made. The emendation appeared to me obvious and certain.
- * I infert—τοις ἡθεσιν—as plainly required by the fense of the passage, and fully warranted by Aristotle's repeated expressions of the same kind.—See above, p. 47.—I found no other corrections necessary.
- This passage is remarkable. It is exactly the language of Rousseau—"il n'y a "AUCUN RAPPORT entre des accords, & les objets qu'on veut peindre, ou les "passions qu'on veut exprimer." [Diet. de Mus. art. imitation: see also the last paragraph of art. harmonie.] Thus, too, Lord Kaims:—"Harmony, pro"perly so called, though delightful when in persection, hath no relation to senti"ment."

"not the case.—Now these motions are analogous to the mo"tion of human actions; and those actions are the index of the "manners."

In

"ment." [El. of Crit. i. 128.] But how is this? The same intervals are the materials both of melody and of harmony. These intervals have, each of them, their peculiar effect and character, and it is by the proper choice of them in fucceffion, and by that only, that melody, confidered abstractedly from rhythm or measure, becomes expressive, or has any "relation to sentiment." Do these intervals, then, lose at once, as by magic, all their variety and striking difference of character, as foon as they are heard in the fimultaneous combinations of harmony? If this be the case, the vocal composer is at once relieved from all care of adapting the harmonies of his accompaniment to the expression of the sentiments conveyed in the words; and it must be matter of perfect indifference whether, for example, he uses the major or minor third—the perfect, or the false, fifth—the common chord, or the chord of the diminished feventh, &c.—With respect to Rousseau, it is not easy to fee how this affertion of his can be reconciled with what he has elfewhere faid. In his letter Sur la Musique Françoise, he expressly allows that every interval, confonant or diffonant, "a fon caractere particulier, c'est à dire, une maniere d' affecter "Pame qui lui est propre."-And upon this depend entirely all the admirable obfervations he has there made, concerning the ill effects which a crowded harmony, and the "rempliffage" of chords, have upon mufical expression.—In another article [ACCORD] of his dictionary, this inconfiftence is still more striking. One would not think it possible for the same writer, who in one place talks of intervals "pro-" pres, par leur dureté, à exprimer l'emportement, la colerc, et LES PASSIONS aigues"and, of-" une barmonie plaintive qui ATTENDRIT LE COEUR"-to assert in another part of the same work, that "il n'y a AUCUN RAPPORT entre des accords, " et LES PASSIONS qu'on veut exprimer."

Had these writers contented themselves with faying, that harmony has much less relation to sentiment than melody, they would not have gone beyond the truth. And the reason of this difference in the effect of the same intervals, in melody, and in harmony, seems, plainly, this—that in melody, these intervals being formed by successive sounds, have, of course, a much closer, and more obvious relation to the tones and inflexions by which sentiments are expressed in speech, than they can have in harmony, where they are formed by sounds heard together.

As to the affection of Ariffotle, it feems only to furnish an additional proof that the antients did not practice anything like our counterpoint, or continued harmony in different parts. Where the utmost use of harmony seems to have been confined to unisons, octaves, fourths, and fifths—where at least no discords, (the most expressive materials of modern harmony,) were allowed—we cannot wonder that the "mixture"

In this problem, the philosopher plainly attributes the expresfive power of musical founds to their succession—to their motion in measured melody. He also distinguishes the rbythmical, from the melodious, fuccession; for he says expressly, that this motion is " both in the rhythm (or measure,) and in the order or arrangement " of founds acute and grave." - But whence the effect of these motions? He answers, from their analogy to the motions of human actions, by which the manners and tempers of men are expressed in common life. With respect to the analogy of rhythmic movement to the various motions of men in action, this, indeed, is sufficiently obvious. But Aristotle goes farther, and supposes that there is also such analogy in the motion of melody considered merely as a fuccession of different tones, without any regard to time; - εν ΤΕ των φθογγων ταξα, των ΟΞΕΩΝ και ΒΑΡΕΩΝ. He plainly afferts, that this fuccession of tones, also, is analogous to the motion of human actions. Now it seems impossible to assign any human action to which a fuccession of founds and intervals, merely as fuch, has, or can have, any relation or fimilitude, except the action (if the expression is allowable,) of speaking, which is such a fuccession. If this be Aristotle's meaning—and I confess myself unable to discover any other-I do not see how we can avoid concluding, that he agreed so far with Plato, as to attribute part, at least, of the effect of Music upon the affections to the analogy between melody and speech.

[&]quot; mixture" of founds in confonance should be thought to have no relation to fentiment, and that all the power of Music over the passions, should be confined to melodious and rhythmical fuccession.

The original is short, and rather obscure. It says, literally, "these motions are "prastical motions:" ωρακτικαι είσιν. But that I have given Aristotle's true meaning in my translation, is evident from a clearer expression in Prob. xxix. which is a shorter solution of the same question. His expression there is—κινησεις είσιν [sc. α ρυθμοι και τα μελη] ΩΣΠΕΡ ΚΑΙ ΑΙ ΠΡΑΞΕΙΣ.—" Rhythm and melody are motions, "as actions also are."

This analogy is, indeed, a curious subject, and deserves, perhaps, a more thorough examination and development than it has yet received. But I shall not trust myself farther with a speculation so likely to draw me wide from the proper business of this note, than just to observe, that the writers above-mentioned, who resolve all the pathetic expression of Music into this principle, though they aftert more than it seems possible to prove, are yet much nearer to the truth than those, who altogether overlook, or reject, that principle; a principle, of which, instances

- h Much light has been flung upon this subject, as far as relates to speech, by Mr. Steele, in his curious and ingenious essay On the Melody and Measure of Speech. But the object of his enquiry was Speech, not Music. His purpose in tracing the resemblance between them, was only to shew that speech is capable of notation; not to examine how far the effect of Music on the passions depends on that resemblance.—His notation is extremely ingenious; but with respect to his project of accompanying the declamation of Tragedy by a drone bass, I must consess that, for my own part, I cannot reslect without some comfort upon the improbability that it will ever be attempted.
- i. After allowing that " different passions and sentiments do indeed give different. "tones and accents to the human voice," Dr. Beattie afks-" but can the tones of "the most pathetic melody be said to bear a resemblance to the voice of a man or "woman speaking from the impulse of passion?" I can only answer, that to my ear, fuch a refemblance, in the "most pathetic melody," is, often, even striking: and I have no doubt that in many passages we are affected from a more delicate and latent degree of that resemblance, sufficient to be felt, in its esfect, though not to be perceived. Dr. Beattie also asks—"if there are not melancholy airs in the sharp key, and "chearful ones in the flat?"—Undoubtedly, the peculiar and opposite characters of these keys, may be variously modified and tempered by the movement, the accent, and the manner of performance, in general: but they can never be deflroyed; much less can they be changed, as Dr. Benttie supposes, to their very opposites. A chearful air in a flat key, I confess, I never heard. If Dr. Beattie thinks the jig in the fifth folo of Corelli chearful, because the movement is allegro, I would beg of him to try an experiment: let him only play the first bar of that jig, (with the bass,) upon a harpfichord, &c. in a major: and when he has attended to the effect of that, let him return to the minor key, and hear the difference.—As to "melancholy airs in a sharp "key," the word melancholy is, I think, used with confiderable latitude, and compichends different fluides. In the lightest of these shades, it may perhaps be applied to forma flances so frequent and so palpable are to be traced in the works of the best masters of vocal composition—in those of Purcell, for example, of Handel, and above all, of Pergoless—that I have often wondered it should have been neglected by so exact a writer as Mr. Harris, though it lay directly in his way, and, in one place, he actually touched it as he passed. He seems, here, to have deserted those antients whom, in general, he most delighted to follow.

But to return to Aristotle, and his treatise on Poetry:—the reader will observe that he does not there affert in general terms, that "Music is an Imitative Art," but only, that the Music " of "the flute and the lyre" is imitative; and even that, not always, but "for the most part." I just mention this, because I have observed in many of the commentators, as well as in other writers, a disposition to extend and generalize his affertions, by which they fome airs in a major key: that key may, by flowness of movement, softness and fmoothness of tone, &c. become folemn, tender, touching, &c.—but I cannot say I recollect any air in that key which makes an impression that can properly be called melancholy. But we must be careful in this matter to allow for the magic of association, which no one better understands, or has described with more feeling and fancy than Dr. Beattie himself. [See p. 173, &c.]—With respect to "a transition from "the one key to the other" [from major to minor, &c.] "in the fame air, without "any fensible change in the expression," I must also confess that it is, to me, totally unknown.—One word more:—Dr. Beattie is "at a loss to conceive how it should "happen, that a mufician overwhelmed with forrow, for example, should put together " a feries of notes, whose expression is contrary to that of another series which he had " put together when elevated with joy." [p. 180.]—But is not Dr. Beattie equally at a loss to conceive how it should happen that any man overwhelmed with forrow, fhould put together, in speaking, (as he certainly does) a series of tones, whose expression is contrary to that of another series which he had put together when elevated with joy? - The two fasts are equally certain, and, even at the first view, so nearly allied, that whoever can account for the one, need not, I am perfuaded, be at the trouble of trying to account separately for the other.

k Ch. ii. § 2.—particularly note 1.

^{1 —} της ἀυλητικής Η ΠΛΕΙΣΤΗ και κιθαρισικής.

have fometimes involved the subject and themselves in unnecessary difficulties.

With respect to modern writers, at least, there seems to be a manifest impropriety in denominating Music an Imitative Art, while they confine the application of the term Imitative to what they confess to be the flightest and least important of all its powers. In this view, confiftence and propriety are, certainly, on the fide of Dr. Beattie, when he would "ftrike Music off the "list of Imitative Arts"." But perhaps even a farther reform may justly be considered as wanting, in our language upon this fubject. With whatever propriety, and however naturally and obviously, the arts both of Mulic, and of POETRY, may be, feparately, and occasionally, regarded and speken of as imitative, yet, when we arrange and class the arts, it seems defirable that a clearer language were adopted. The notion, that Painting, Poetry and Music are all Arts of Imitation, certainly tends to produce, and has produced, much confusion. That they all, in some sense of the word, or other, imitate, cannot be denied; but the fenses of the word when applied to Poetry, or Music, are so different both from each other, and from that in which it is applied to Painting, Sculpture, and the arts of defign in general—the only arts that m Page 129.

What shall we say to those who add Architecture to the list of Imitative Arts?—One would not expect to find so absurd a notion adopted by so clear and philosophical a writer as M. d'Alembert. Yet in his Discours Prel. de l'Encyclop. he not only makes Architecture an imitative art, but even classes it with painting and sculpture. He allows, indeed, that the imitation "de la belle nature, y est moins "frappante & plus resservée que dans les deux autres arts:"—but how is it any imitation at all?—only because it imitates "par l'assemblage et l'union des disserens corps qu'elle emploie"—what?—"l'arrangement symmetrique que la nature observe plus ou moins sensiblement dans chaque individu, &c." [Mel. de lit. i. 63.] I can only say, that, upon this principle, the joiner, the smith, and the mechanic of almost every kind, have a sair claim to be elevated to the rank of Imitative Artists: for if a regular building be an imitation of "la belle nature," so is a chair, a table, or a pair of fire-tongs.

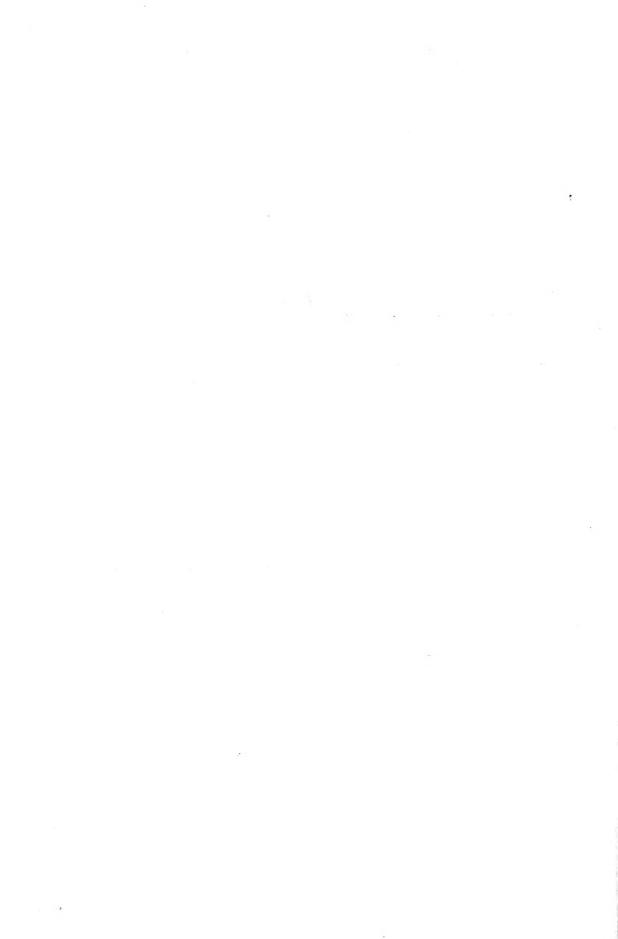

are obviously and essentially imitative—that when we include them all, without distinction, under the same general denomination of Imitative Arts, we seem to defeat the only useful purpose of all classing and arrangement; and, instead of producing order and method in our ideas, produce only embarrassiment and consusion. [See Diss. I. p. 3, 4.]

•

ARISTOTLE

ON POETRY.

CONTENTS.

PARTI.

GENERAL AND COMPARATIVE VIEW OF POETRY AND ITS PRINCIPAL SPECIES.

SECT	PAGE.
	INTRODUCTION	- 65
I.	Poetry-a species of Imitation —	— ib.
II.	Different means of Imitation —	66
III.	Different objects of Imitation — —	67
IV.	Different manner of Imitation — —	68
V.	Origin of Poetry — — —	69
VI.	Its division into ferious and ludicrous —	 70
VII.	Progrefs of Tragedy — — —	 72
VIII.	Object and progress of Comedy -	 73
IX.	Epic and Tragic species compared —	- 74
	P A R T II.
	OF TRAGEDY.
1.	Definition of Tragedy — —	- 75
II.	Deduction of its conflituent parts —	— ib.
III.	Comparative importance of those parts	- 76
*	* I *	IV. Of

SECT.				PΑ	GE.
IV. Of the	FABLE [to Sect.	. 15.]—it shou	ild be a pe	erfect
	, and of a certain				79
V. Unity of				_	80
•	t provinces of the	e Poet and the	Historian	-	82
VII. Epifodic	*	beneged			83
VIII. Fables,	simple, or complic	eated			84
	the Fable. 1.		2. Discov	eries.	-
3. Di/			-		ib.
0	to which Traged	y is divided			86
	atastrophe, and v	•	, best ada	apted
	purpose of Trage			· —	87
XII. Catastro	phe should be fin	igle, and that	unhappy		88
XIII. Terror	and Pity to be e	excited by the	action, no	ot by the dec	coration, or specta	cle —	-		89
XIV. Of difaj	trous incidents a	nd t he prope	r manage	ment	2 of the					90
XV. Of the	MANNERS				92
XVI. Of the	different kinds of	F $Discovery$	-	-	95
XVII. Practica	l directions for th	ne Tragic Poe	t —		98
XVIII. Complica	$\it ntion$ and $\it Develop$	ment of the pl	ot —		100
XIX. Differen	nt kinds of T rage	dy -			ib.
XX. Too gre	eat extent of plan	to be avoided	l —		101
XXI. Of the	Chorus —	*		_	102
XXII. Of the	SENTIMENTS		-		103
XXIII. Of the	DICTION, [to t]	he end of this	part]		104
	s of Diction, or		-		ib.
XXV. Differer	nt kinds of words	h	-	•	107
XXVI. Of Poe	tic Diction -				110

PART III.

OF THE EPIC POEM.

$ECT.	P A	AGE.
Le In what Epic and Tragic Poetry agree	e	114
II. In what they differ — —		117
III. Epic Narration should be dramatic an	nd imitative -	811
. IV Epic admits the wonderful more eafily	, and in a greater degree, than Tragedy —	general prompts	ib.
V. Fiction, how made to pass as truth	-	119
·VI. Of the improbable and abfurd —	annual annual	ib.

P A R T IV.

OF CRITICAL OBJECTIONS, AND THE PRIN-CIPLES ON WHICH THEY ARE TO BE ANSWERED.

I. Principles on which Poetry is to be defended		122
II. Application of the last principle — —		123
III. ———— of the first — —		124
IV. Censure of immoral speech, or action - how	to be	_ examined — — —	-	125
V. Application of the fecond principle — —	-	ib.
VI. Censure of impossibility farther considered —	-	130
VII. — Inconfistence — —		131
VIII. — Improbability and vitious character	-	ib.

PART V.

OF THE SUPERIORITY OF TRAGIC TO EPIC POETRY.

SECT	Γ.			PΑ	GE.
I.	Objection to Tragedy	 -	-	-	132
II.	That objection answered	•			133
III.	Advantages of Tragedy	 -	-	-	ib.
IV.	Preference of Tragedy			•	135
	CONCLUSION	-	,	-	ib.

P A R

GENERAL AND COMPARATIVE VIEW OF POETRY AND ITS PRINCIPAL SPECIES.

INTRODUCTION.

Y defign is to treat of POETRY in general, and of its Design. L feveral species—to inquire, what is the proper effect of each—what construction of a fable, or plan, is effential to a good Poem—of what, and how many, parts, each species consists; with whatever elfe belongs to the same subject: which I shall confider in the order that most naturally presents itself.

Epic Poetry, Tragedy, Comedy, Dithyrambics, as also, for Poetry a spethe most part, the Music of the slute, and of the lyre-all these cies of IMIare, in the most general view of them, IMITATIONS'; differing, however, from each other in three respects, according to the different means, the different objects, or the different manner, of their imitation.

TATION.

II. For,

The application of this term to Pectry, in general, is confidered in Differtation I .- to Music, in Diff. II .- to Dithyrambic Poetry, in NOTE 1.

Different Imitation.

For, as men, fome through art, and fome through habit, MEANS of imitate various objects, by means of colour and figure, and others, again, by voice2; fo, with respect to the arts above-mentioned, rhythm, words, and melody, are the different means by which, either fingle, or variously combined, they all produce their imitation.

> For example: in the imitations of the flute, and the lyre, and of any other instruments capable of producing a similar effect—as the fyrinx, or pipe—melody and rhythm only are employed. In those of Dance, rhythm alone, without melody; for there are dancers who, by rhythm applied to gesture3, express manners, passions, and actions.

> The EPOPOEIA imitates by words alone, or by werfe*; and that verse may either be composed of various metres, or confined, according to the practice hitherto established, to a single species. For we should, otherwise, have no general name which would comprehend the Mimes of Sophron and Xenarchus, and the Secretic dialogues; or Poems in Iambic, Elegiac, or other metres, in which the Epic species of imitation may be conveyed. Custom, indeed, connecting the poetry or making with the metre, has denominated some Elegiac Poets, i. e. makers of elegiac verse; others, Epic Poets;

- ² Vocal miniery; imitation by tone of voice merely: See Diff. I. towards the end, Nete !.- And Note 2, on this paffage.
- 3 The expression from inaccurate; for it is by their gestures that they express, or ...direct 3-not by the rhythm, or measured motion, of those gestures .- See NOTE 4, where I have endeavoured to account for Aristotle's expressing himself thus.
- * i. c. by seconds only, without melody and rhythm; or, at most, with no other rh, than is implied in the idea of metre: - without rhythm in its mufical acceptation of time. See NOTE 5.
- ⁵ It may be necessary to observe, that the Greek word, (wonthy-posities) whence from end feet, is, literally, maker; and maker, it is well known, was once the cursens term for fact in our language; and to write verses, was, to make. Sir Philip Salney, speaking of the Greek word, fays-" wherein, I know not whether by luck Gor wildow, we Englithmen have met with the Greeks, in calling him Maker."

Epic Poets; i. e. makers of benameter verse; thus distinguishing the Poets, not according to the nature of their imitation, but according to that of their metre only. For even they, who compose treatises of medicine, or natural philosophy, in verse, are denominated Poets; yet Homer and Empedolles have nothing in common, except their metre; the former, therefore, justly merits the name of Poet; while the other should rather be called a Physiologist than a Poet.

So, also, though any one should chuse to convey his imitation in every kind of metre, promiscuously, as Chaeremon has done in his Gentaur, which is a medley of all forts of verse, it would not immediately follow, that, on that account merely, he was entitled to the name of Poet.—But of this, enough.—

There are, again, other species of Poetry which make use of all the means of imitation, rhythm, melody, and verse. Such are, the Dithyrambic, that of Nomes, Tragedy, and Comedy: with this difference, however, that in some of these, they are employed all together, in others, separately. And such are the differences of these arts with respect to the means by which they imitate.

III.

But, as the objects of imitation are the actions of men, and these men must of necessity be either good or bad, (for on this does character principally depend; the manners being, in all men, most strongly marked by virtue and vice,) it follows, that we can only Different objects of imitation.

So Spenfer;

The god of fliepherds, Tityrus, is dead, Who taught me, homely, as I can, to MAKE.

Sty. Cal. June.

of hymns, to Apollo, and other deities, all the means of imitation were employed together, and throughout: in Tragedy and Comedy, feparately; force of them in one part of the drama, and fome in another. (See Part II. Sect. 1.) In the chiral part, however, at least, if no where else, all, melody, rhythm and words, must probably have been used at once, as in the hymns.

K 2

represent

represent men, either as better than they actually are, or worse, or exactly as they are: just as, in Painting, the pictures of Polygnotus were above the common level of nature; those of Pauson, below it; those of Dianysius, faithful likenesses.

Now it is evident that each of the imitations above-mentioned will admit of these differences, and become a different kind of imitation, as it imitates objects that differ in this respect. This may be the case with Dancing; with the Music of the slute, and of the lyre; and, also, with the Poetry which employs words, or werse only, without melody, or rhythm: thus, Homer has drawn men superior to what they are; Cleophon, as they are; Hegemon the Thasian, the inventor of parodies, and Nicocharis, the author of the Deliad, worse than they are.

So, again, with respect to Dithyrambics, and Nomes: in these, too, the imitation may be as different as that of the Persians, by Timotheus, and the Cyclops, by Philoxenus.

Tragedy, also, and Comedy, are distinguished in the same manner; the aim of Comedy being, to exhibit men worse than we find them, that of Tragedy, better.

IV.

Different MANNER of imitation.

There remains the third difference—that of the manner in which each of these objects may be imitated. For the Poet, imitating the fame object, and by the fame means, may do it either in NARRATION—and that, again, either personating other characters, as Homer does, or, in his own person throughout, without change:

⁷ Superior, that is, in courage, strength, wissom, prudence, &c.—in any laudable, useful, or admirable quality, whether such as we denominate moral, or not. If superiority of moral character only were meant, the affertion would be false.—It is necessary to remember here, the wisle sense in which the antients used the terms virtue, vice—good, bad, &c. See NOTE 19.—The difference between moral, and poetical, persection of character, is well explained by Dr. Beattie, Essay on Pactry, &c. Part I. eh. 4.—The herces of Homer, as he well observes, are "finer animals" than we are; (p. 69.) not better nen.

DRAWA. Digreft on concerning the different claims to its inven-

change:—or, he may imitate by reprefenting all his characters as real, and employed in the very ACTION itself.

These, then, are the three differences by which, as I said in the beginning, all imitation is diffinguished; those of the means, the object, and the manner: fo that Sophocles is, in one respect, an imitator of the fame kind with Homer, as elevated characters are the objects of both; in another respect, of the same kind with Ariflophanes, as both imitate in the way of action; whence, according to some, the application of the term Drama [i. e. action] to fuch Poems. Upon this it is that the Dorians ground their claim to the invention both of Tragedy and Comedy. For Comedy is claimed by the Megarians; both by national those of Greece, who contend that it took its rise in their popular government; and by those of Sicily, among whom the poet Epicharmus flourished long before Chionides and Magnes: and Tragedy, also, is claimed by some of the Dorians of Peloponnesus. —In support of these claims they argue from the words themselves. They allege, that the Doric word for a village is COME, the Attic, DEMOS; and that Comedians were fo called, not from Comazeinto revel-but from their strolling about the Comai, or villages? before they were tolerated in the city. They fay, farther, that, to do, or act, they express by the word DRAN; the Athenians by PRATTEIN.

And thus much as to the differences of imitation—how many, and what, they are.

POETRY, in general, feems to have derived its origin from Origin of two causes, each of them natural.

Poetry.

- 1. To IMITATE is instinctive in man from his infancy. this he is diffinguished from other animals, that he is, of all, the most imitative, and through this instinct receives his earliest edu-
 - Who were all of Doric origin.
 - 9 A derivation very honourable to itinerant players.

cation.

cation*. All men, likewise, naturally receive pleasure from imitation. This is evident from what we experience in viewing the works of imitative art; for in them, we contemplate with pleasure, and with the more pleasure, the more exactly they are imitated, such objects as, if real, we could not fee without pain; as, the figures of the meanest and most disgusting animals, dead bodies, and the like. And the reason of this is, that to learn, is a natural pleafure, not confined to philosophers, but common to all men; with this difference only, that the multitude partake of it in a more transfient and compendious manner. Hence the pleasure they receive from a picture: in viewing it they learn', they infer, they diferent, what every object is: that this, for instance, is such a particular man, &c. For if we suppose the object represented to be fornething which the spectator had never seen, his pleasure, in that case, will not arise from the imitation, but from the workmanship, the colours, or some such cause.

Imitation, then, being thus natural to us, and, 2ndly, MELODY and RHYTHM* being also natural, (for as to metre, it is plainly a species of rhythm,) those persons, in whom, originally, these propensities were the strongest, were naturally led to rude and extemporaneous attempts, which, gradually improved, gave birth to POETRY.

VI.

Its divition into Two HINDS—the SERIOUS and the LU-DICROUS.

But this Poetry, following the different characters of its authors, naturally divided itself into two different kinds. They who were

- * See Dr. Beattie's Effay on Poetry, &c. Part I. ch. 6.
- ² This is explained in NOTE 22.
- * "RHYTHM differs from METRE, in as much as RHYTHM is proportion, applied to any motion volvatever; METRE is proportion, applied to the motion of WORDS SPOKEN. Thus, in the drumming of, a march, or the dancing of a hornpipe, there is rhythm, though no matre; in Dryden's celebrated ode there is METRE as well as "RHYTHM, because the Poet with the rhythm has associated certain words. And hence it follows, that, though ALL METRE is RHYTHM, yet ALL RHYTHM is not metre." Harris's Philol. Inquiries, p. 67.—where it is also observed, very truly, that "no English word expresses rhythmus better than the word, time. P. 69. note.

of a grave and lofty spirit, chose, for their imitation, the actions and the adventures of elevated characters: while Poets of a lighter turn, represented those of the vitious and contemptible. And these composed, originally, Satires; as the former did Hymns and Encomia.

Of the lighter kind, we have no Poem anterior to the time of Homer, though many fuch, in all probability, there were; but, from his time, we have; as, his Margites, and others of the fame fpecies, in which the Iambic was introduced as the most proper measure; and hence, indeed, the name of Iambic, because it was the measure in which they used to IAMBIZE, [i. e. to fatirize,] each other.

And thus these old Poets were divided into two classes—those who used the *beroic*³, and those who used the iambic, verse.

And as, in the ferious kind, Homer alone may be faid to deferve the name of Poet, not only on account of his other excellences, but also of the dramatic fpirit of his imitations; so was he likewise the first who suggested the idea of Comedy, by substituting ridicule for investive, and giving that ridicule a dramatic cast: for his Margires bears the same analogy to Comedy, as his Iliad and Odyssey to Tragedy.—But when Tragedy and Comedy, had once made their appearance, succeeding Poets, according to the turn of their genius, attached themselves to the one, or the other, of these new species: the lighter fort, instead of Iambic, became Comic Poets; the graver, Tragic, instead of Heroic: and that, on account of the superior dignity and higher estimation of these latter forms of Poetry.

Whether Tragedy has now, with respect to its constituent parts⁵, received the utmost improvement of which it is capable, considered ³ i. e. hexameters, composed of dactyls and spondees, which were called hereic feet.

^{*} See Part III. Sect. 3.

^{*} i. e. the fable, the manners, the sentiments, &c .- See Part II. Sect. 2.

both in it felf, and relatively to the theatre, is a question that belongs not to this place.

VII.

PROGRESS of TRA-GEDY. Both Tragedy, then, and Comedy, having originated in a rude and unpremeditated manner—the first from the Dithyrambic hymns, the other from those Phallic fongs⁶, which, in many cities, remain still in use—each advanced gradually towards perfection, by such successive improvements as were most obvious.

TRAGEDY, after various changes, reposed at length in the completion of its proper form. ÆSCHYLUS first added a second actor'; he also abridged the CHORUS, and made the dialogue the principal part of Tragedy. Sopholles increased the number of actors to three, and added the decoration of painted scenery. It was also late before Tragedy threw aside the short and simple fable, and ludicrous language, of its satyric original, and attained its proper magnitude and dignity. The Lambic measure was then first adopted: for, originally, the Trochaic tetrameter was made use of, as better suited to the satyric and saltatorial genius of the Poem at that

- 6 Of the licentious and obscene RELIGIOUS CEREMONY here alluded to, the reader, who has any curiofity about it, may find some account in Potter's Antiquities of Greece, vol. i. p. 383.
- ⁷ The first who introduced a single actor, or speaker, between those choral songs which originally, we are told, formed the whole of Tragedy, i. e. according to the most usual derivation of the word, the goat-singing, was Thespis, whom Aristotle passes over in silence. The story so often told, of him and his theatrical waggon, it cannot be necessary to repeat.—By introducing a second actor, Æschylus, in sact, introduced the dialogue; though it seems probable that the single speaker of Thespis told his tale, in part, at least, dramatically. See Brumoy's Dife. sur l'Orig. de la Trag. Sect. iii.—Theatre des Grecs, Tome i.
- * Satyric, from the share which those fantastic beings called Satyrs, the companions and play-fellows of Bacelus, had in the earliest Tragedy, of which they formed the chorus. Joking, and dancing, were essential attributes of these rustic semi-deities. Hence, the "lusicrous language," and the "dancing genius" of the old Tragedy, to which, that time; but when the dialogue was formed, nature itself pointed out the proper metre. For the iambic is, of all metres, the most colloquial; as appears evidently from this fact, that our common conversation frequently falls into iambic verse; seldom into hexameter, and only when we depart from the usual melody of speech. -Episodes were, also, multiplied, and every other part of the drama fucceffively improved and polished.

But of this enough: to enter into a minute detail would, perhaps, be a talk of some length.

VIII.

COMEDY, as was faid before, is an imitation of bad characters; Object and bad, not with respect to every fort of vice, but to the RIDICULOUS only, as being a species of turpitude or deformity; fince it may be defined to be—a fault or deformity of fuch a fort as is neither painful nor destructive. A ridiculous face, for example, is fomething ugly and difforted, but not so as to cause pain.

PROGRESS of Come-

The fucceflive improvements of Tragedy, and the respective authors of them, have not escaped our knowledge; but those of Comedy, from the little attention that was paid to it in its origin, remain in obscurity. For it was not till late, that Comedy was authorized by the magistrate, and carried on at the public expence: it was, at first, a private and voluntary exhibition. From the time, indeed, when it began to acquire some degree of form, its Poets have been recorded; but who first introduced masks, or prologues, or augmented the number of actors—these, and other particulars of the same kind, are unknown.

Epicharmus and Phormis were the first who invented comic This improvement, therefore, is of Sicilian origin. which the TROCHAIC or running metre here spoken of was peculiarly adapted; being no other than this:

" Jolly mortals, fill your glasses, noble deeds are done by wine." The reader will not confound fatyric with fatiric; nor the Greek fatyric drama, with the satire of Roman origin. See Harris's Phil. Arrang. p. 460. note. Or, Dacier's Preface to Horace's Satires. The two words are of different derivations.

of Athenian Poets, Crates was the first who abandoned the Iambic' form of comedy, and made use of invented and general stories, or fables.

IX.

EPIC and TRAGIC Species COMPARED.

Epic Poetry agrees so far with Tragic, as it is an imitation of great characters and actions, by means of words: but in this it differs, that it makes use of only one kind of metre throughout; and that it is narrative. It also differs in length: for Tragedy endeavours, as far as possible, to confine its action within the limits of a single revolution of the sun, or nearly so; but the time of Epic action is indefinite. This, however, at first, was equally the case with Tragedy itself.

Of their constituent parts, some are common to both, some peculiar to Tragedy. He, therefore, who is a judge of the beauties and defects of Tragedy, is, of course, equally a judge with respect to those of Epic Poetry: for all the parts of the Epic poem are to be found in Tragedy; not all those of Tragedy, in the Epic poem.

⁹ Iambic, i. e. fatirical, and personally so, like the old Iambi, investives, or lampoons, of which Aristotle speaks above, Sect. 6. and from which the Iambic metre, which is not here alluded to, took its name.

II. R P Α

TRAGEDY.

I.

F the species of Poetry which imitates in bevanueters, and Definiof Comedy, we shall speak hereafter. Let us now consider Tion of TRAGEDY; collecting, first, from what has been already said, its true and effential definition.

Tragedy.

Tragedy, then, is an imitation of some action that is important, entire, and of a proper magnitude—by language, embellished and rendered pleasurable, but by different means in different parts—in the way, not of narration, but of action—effecting through pity and terror, the correction and refinement of such passions.

By pleasurable language, I mean a language that has the embellishments of rhythm, inclody, and metre. And I add, by different means in different parts, because in some parts metre alone is employed, in others, melody.

Η.

Now as Tragedy imitates by acting, the DECORATION*, in the first place, must necessarily be one of its parts: then the * Decoration—literally, the decoration of the spectacle, or sight. In other places it PART: is called the speciacle, or sight only—6445. It comprehends seenery, dresses—the whole visible apparatus of the theatre. I do not know any fingle English word, that answers fully to the Greek word.

MELOPOEIA,

L 2

MELOPOEIA, (or Music',) and the diction; for these last include the means of tragic imitation. By diction, I mean the metrical composition of the meaning of Melopaia is obvious to every one.

Again—Tragedy being an imitation of an action, and the perfons employed in that action being necessarily characterized by their manners and their sentiments, since it is from these that actions themselves derive their character, it follows, that there must also be, MANNERS, and SENFIMENTS, as the two causes of actions, and, consequently, of the happiness, or unhappiness, of all men. The imitation of the action is the FABLE: for by fable I now mean the contexture of incidents, or the plot. By manners, I mean, whatever marks the characters of the persons. By sentiments, whatever they say, whether proving anything, or delivering a general sentiment, &c.*

Hence, all Tragedy must necessarily contain fix parts, which, together, constitute its peculiar character, or quality: FABLE, MANNERS, DICTION, SENTIMENTS, DECORATION, and MUSIC. Of these parts, two relate to the means, one to the manner, and three to the object, of imitation. And these are all. These specific parts, if we may so call them, have been employed by most Poets, and are all to be found in [almost] every Tragedy.

III.

COMPARA-TIVE IM-PORTANCE of the PART But of all these parts the most important is the combination of incidents, or, the FABLE. Because Tragedy is an imitation, not

- "Meleparia—literally, the making, or the composition, of the music; as we use Experia, or according to the French termination, which we have naturalized, Enoper, to signify spic factry, or epic-making, in general.—I might have rendered it of the Music; but that it would have appeared ridiculous to observe, of a world so fundiar to us, even that "its meaning is obvious."
- Not the verification, but merely the metrical expression—the language of the serie. This is plain from the clearer definition, p. 78.
 - * For a filler account of Mis part of Tragedy, Ge Sal. 22.
- * Myli, and diction, to the means, which are words, melody, and chethen: decoration, to the manner of initiating—i. e. by reprefentation and action: fable, manners, and finite cute, to the objects of imitation—i. e. men, and their actions, characters, &c.
 - 2 1, c. fuch ... are effectful to Tragedy, and, together, conflitute its species.

of men, but of actions 4—of life, of happiness and unhappiness: for happiness consists in action, and the supreme good itself, the very end of life, is action of a certain kind 5—not quality. Now the manners of men constitute only their quality or characters; but it is by their actions that they are happy, or the contrary. Tragedy, therefore, does not imitate action, for the fake of imitating manners, but in the imitation of action, that of manners is of course involved. So that the action and the fable are the end of Tragedy; and in every thing the end is of principal importance.

Again—Tragedy cannot subsist without action; without manners it may: the Tragedies of most modern Poets have this defect; a defect common, indeed, among Poets in general. As among Painters also, this is the case with Zeuxis, compared with Polygnotus: the latter excels in the expression of the manners; there is no such expression in the pictures of Zeuxis.

Farther—suppose any one to string together a number of speeches in which the manners are strongly marked, the language and the sentiments well turned; this will not be sufficient to produce the proper effect of Tragedy: that end will much rather be answered by a piece, desective in each of those particulars, but surnished with a proper sable and contexture of incidents. Just as in Painting, the most brilliant colours, spread at random and without design, will give far less pleasure than the simplest outline of a sigure.

Add to this, that those parts of Tragedy, by means of which it becomes most interesting and affecting, are parts of the fable; I mean, revolutions, and discoveries.

As a farther proof, adventurers in Tragic writing are foonerable to arrive at excellence in the language, and the manners, than in the construction of a plot; as appears from almost all our earlier Poets.

⁴ See the Dist. On the Provinces of the Drama, ch. i. [Dr. Hurd's Hor. vol. ii.]

⁵ i. e. virtusus action.—The doctrine of Ariffotle was, that the greatest happiness, the funnum bonum or end of life, confished in virtuous energies and actions; not in virtue, confidered merely as an internal habit, disposition, or quality, of mind.

⁶ These are explained afterwards, Sect. 9.

The fable, then, is the principal part, the foul, as it were, of Tragedy; and the MANNERS are next in rank: Tragedy being an imitation of an action, and through that, principally, of the agents.

In the third place fland the SENTIMENTS. To this part it belongs, to fay fuch things as are true and proper; which, in the dialogue, depends on the Political' and Rhetorical arts: for, the antients made their characters fpeak in the ftyle of political and popular eloquence; but now, the rhetorical manner prevails.

The manners are, whatever manifests the disposition of the speaker. There are speeches, therefore, which are without manners, or character; as not containing any thing by which the propensities or aversions of the person who delivers them can be known. The sentiments comprehend whatever is said; whether proving any thing, affirmatively, or negatively, or expressing some general restection, &c.

Fourth, in order, is the DICTION; that is, as I have already faid, the expression of the sentiments by words; the power and effect of which is the same, whether in verse or prose.

Of the remaining two parts, the MUSIC stands next; of all the pleasurable accompaniments and embellishments of Tragedy, the most delightful.

The DECORATION has, also, a great effect, but, of all the parts, is most foreign to the art. For the power of Tragedy is felt without representation, and actors; and the beauty of the decorations depends more on the art of the mechanic, than on that of the Poet^s.

⁷ The reader, here, must not think of our modern posities.—The political, or civil art, or science, was, in Aristotle's view, of wide extent, and high importance. It comprehended ethics, and eloquence, or the art of public speaking; every thing, in short, that concerned the well-being of a state.—See NOTE 57.

^{*} The reader will find a useful comment on this, and the two preceding sections, in the Puilolog. Inquiries, Part II. ch. vi. viii. ix. xi.

IV.

These things being thus adjusted, let us go on to examine in Of the FAwhat manner the FABLE should be constructed; since this is the ble-[to first, and most important part of Tragedy.

Sect. 15.7

Now we have defined Tragedy to be an imitation of an action that is complete and entire; and that has also a certain magnitude; for a thing may be entire, and a whole, and yet not be of any magnitude9.

1. By entire, I mean that which has a beginning, a middle, and It should be an end. A beginning, is that which does not, necessarily, suppose a PERFECT any thing before it, but which requires fomething to follow it. An end, on the contrary, is that which supposes something to precede it, either necessarily, or probably; but which nothing is required to follow. A middle, is that which both supposes fomething to precede, and requires fomething to follow. The Poet, therefore, who would construct his fable properly, is not at liberty to begin, or end, where he pleases, but must conform to these definitions.

WHOLE-

2. Again: whatever is beautiful, whether it be an animal, or any -and of other thing composed of different parts, must not only have those a certain parts arranged in a certain manner, but must also be of a certain TUDE. magnitude; for beauty confifts in magnitude and order. Hence it is that no very minute animal can be beautiful; the eye comprehends the whole too inftantaneously to distinguish and compare the parts:—neither, on the contrary, can one of a prodigious fize be beautiful; because, as all its parts cannot be seen at once, the whole, the unity of object, is lost to the spectator; as it would be,

- 9 i. e.—not be large.—Magnitude is here used in its proper and relative sense, of greatness; and with reference to some standard.
- * The unity here spoken of, it must be remembered, is not absolute and simple, but relative and compound, unity; a unity confifting of different parts, the relation of which to each other, and to the whole, is eafily perceived at one view. On this depends the perception of beauty in form. In objects too extended, you may be fail to have parts, but no whole: in very minute objects a whole, but no parts.

for example, if he were furveying an animal of many miles in length. As, therefore, in animals, and other objects, a certain magnitude is requisite, but that magnitude must be such as to present a whole easily comprehended by the eye; so, in the sable, a certain length is requisite, but that length must be such as to present a whole easily comprehended by the memory.

With respect to the measure of this length—if referred to actual representation in the dramatic contests, it is a matter foreign to the art itself: for if a hundred Tragedies were to be exhibited in concurrence, the length of each performance must be regulated by the hour-glass; a practice of which, it is said, there have formerly been instances. But, if we determine this measure by the nature of the thing itself, the more extensive the sable, consistently with the clear and easy comprehension of the whole, the more beautiful will it be, with respect to magnitude. In general, we may say, that an action is sufficiently extended, when it is long enough to admit of a change of fortune, from happy to unhappy, or the reverse, brought about by a succession, necessary or probable, of well-connected incidents.

V.

Unity of the Fable.

A fable is not one, as some conceive it to be, merely because the berro of it is one. For numberless events happen to one man, many of which are such as cannot be connected into one event: and so, likewise, there are many actions of one man which cannot be connected into any one assion. Hence appears the mistake of all these Poets who have composed Herculeids, Theseids, and other Poems of that kind. They conclude that because Herculeis was one, so also must be the sable of which he is the subject. But Homer, among his many other excellences, seems also to have been persectly aware of this mistake, either from art or genius. For when he composed his Odyssey, he did not introduce all the events of his hero's life,—such, for instance, as the wound he received upon Parnassus²—his feigned madness² when the Grecian army was assembling, &c.—events, not connected, either by necessary or probable consequence, with each other; but he comprehended those only which have relation to one action; for such we call that of the Odysfey.—And in the same manner he composed his *Iliad*⁴.

As, therefore, in other mimetic arts, one imitation' is an imitation of one thing, so here, the sable, being an imitation of an action, should be an imitation of an action that is one, and entire; the parts of it being so connected, that if any one of them be either transposed or taken away, the whole will be destroyed, or changed: for whatever may be either retained, or omitted, without making any sensible difference, is not, properly, a part.

- ² This incident is, however, related, and at confiderable length, in the xixth book of the Odyssey, (v. 563 of Pope's translation) but digressively, and incidentally; it made no effential part of his general plan.—See Sect. 17.
- A ridiculous ftory.—" To avoid going to the Trejan war, Ulysses pretended to be mad; and, to prove his infanity, went to plough with an ox and a horse; but Pala-"medes, in order to detect him, laid his infant son, Telemachus, in the way of the plough; upon which Ulysses immediately stopped, and thereby proved himself to be in his right senses."—(Hyginus, &c.)
- 4 Or, according to a different, and perhaps preferable, reading, thus:—"but he "planned his Odyffey, as he also did his Iliad, upon an action that is one in the sense "here explained."—See the NOTE.
- 5 i. e. one imitative work. Thus one picture represents, or freuil represent, but one thing;—a single object, or a single action, &c. So, every Poem, (the Orlands Furioso as much as the Iliad,) is one initation—one imitative room, and should imitate one action, in Aristotle's sense of unity, like the Poems of Homer; not a number of actions unconnected with each other, or connected merely by their common relation to one person, as in the Theseids, &c. or to one time, as in the Poem of Ariosto; or, by their resemblance merely, as in the Alstonorphyses of Ovid.
- "The painter will not enquire what things may be admitted without much cen"fure. He will not think it enough to flow that they may be there, he will flow that "they must be there; that their absence would render his picture mainted and defective.
 "They should make a part of that whole which would be imperfect without them."

 Sir J. Reynolds, Disc. on Painting, p. 106.

VI.

Different Provinces of the Poet and the His-TORIAN. It appears, farther, from what has been faid, that it is not the Poet's province to relate fuch things as have actually happened, but fuch as might have happened—fuch as are possible, according either to probable, or necessary, consequence.

For it is not by writing in verse, or prose, that the Historian and the Poet are distinguished: the work of Herodotus might be versisted; but it would still be a species of history, no less with metre, than without. They are distinguished by this, that the one relates what bas been, the other what might be. On this account, Poetry is a more philosophical, and a more excellent thing, than History: for Poetry is chiefly conversant about general truth; History, about particular. In what manner, for example, any person of a certain character would speak, or act, probably, or necessarily—this is general; and this is the object of Poetry, even while it makes use of particular names. But, what Alcibiades did, or what happened to him—this is particular truth.

With respect to Comedy, this is now become obvious; for here, the Poet, when he has formed his plot of probable incidents, gives to his characters whatever names he pleases; and is not, like the lambic Poets, particular, and personal.

Tragedy, indeed, retains the use of real names; and the reason is, that, what we are disposed to believe, we must think possible: now what has never actually happened, we are not apt to regard as possible; but what has been is unquestionably so, or it could not have been at all. There are, however, some Tragedies in which one or two of the names are historical, and the rest seigned: there are even some, in which none of the names are historical; such is Agatho's Tragedy called The Flower; for in that, all is invenor it could not, &c."—The philosopher might fasely have trusted to any reader to find this proof of the possibility of what has actually happened.—A modern writer would certainly have omitted this; and I wish Aristotle had. But it is my business to say whatever he has said.

tion, both incidents, and names; and yet it pleafes. It is by no means, therefore, effential, that a Poet should confine himself to the known and established subjects of Tragedy. Such a restraint would, indeed, be ridiculous; fince even those subjects that are known, are known, comparatively, but to few, and yet are interesting to all.

From all this it is manifest, that a Poet should be a Poet, or maker, of fables, rather than of verses; fince it is imitation that constitutes the Poet, and of this imitation actions are the object: nor is he the less a Poet, though the incidents of his fable should chance to be such as have actually happened; for nothing hinders, but that some true events may possess that probability, the invention of which entitles him to the name of Poet.

VIII.

Of simple fables or actions, the episodic are the worst. I call Episodic that an episodic fable, the cpisodes' of which follow each other FABLES, without any probable or necessary connection; a fault into which and why. bad Poets are betrayed by their want of skill, and good Poets by the players: for in order to accommodate their pieces to the purposes of rival performers in the dramatic contests, they spin out the action beyond their powers, and are thus, frequently, forced to break the connection and continuity of its parts.

the worst-

But Tragedy is an imitation, not only of a complete action, but aifo of an action exciting terror and pity. Now that purpose is

It may appear to the reader to be a strange observation, that " some true " events MAY be probable." But he will recollect what fort of events, and what fort of probability, Arifiotle here speaks of: i.e. of extraordinary events, such as Poetry requires, and of that more first and perfett probability, that closer connection and visible dependence of circumstances, which are always required from the Poet, though, in fuch events, not often to be found in fact, and real life, and therefore not expected from the Hifterian.—See the quotation from Diderot, NOTE 156.

⁹ Episodes - episodic circumstances - in the second sense explained NOTE 37: by no means in the modern and epic fense, of a digreffien, incidental narrative, &c.

best answered by such events as are not only unexpected, but unexpected consequences of each other: for, by this means, they will have more of the wonderful, than if they appeared to be the effects of chance; since we find, that, among events merely casual, those are the most wonderful and striking, which seem to imply design: as when, for instance, the statue of Mitys at Argos killed the very man who had murdered Mitys, by falling down upon him as he was surveying it; events of this kind, not having the appearance of accident. It follows then, that such sables as are formed on these principles must be the best.

VIII.

Fables SIM-PLE OF COMPLI-CATED. Fables are of two forts, fimple and complicated; for so also are the actions themselves of which they are imitations. An action, (having the continuity and unity prescribed,) I call fimple, when its catastrophe is produced without either revolution, or discovery: complicated, when with one, or both. And these should arise from the structure of the sable itself, so as to be the natural consequences, necessary or probable, of what has preceded in the action. For there is a wide difference between incidents that sollow from, and incidents that sollow only after, each other.

IX.

PARTS of the FABLE.

I.
REVOLU- A REVOLUTION, is a change, (fuch as has already been mentioned',) into the reverse of what is expected from the circumstances of the action; and that, produced, as we have said, by probable, or necessary consequence.

Thus, in the Oedipus', the messenger, meaning to make Oedipus happy, and to relieve him from the dread he was under with respect to his mother, by making known to him his real birth, produces an effect directly contrary to his intention. Thus, also, in the Tragedy of Lynceus: Lynceus is led to suffer death, Danaus follows to inflict it; but the event, resulting from the course of the incidents, is, that Danaus is killed, and Lynceus saved.

^{*} Sect. 7.—" events that are unexpetled confequences of each other."

[?] The Ordipus Tyrannus of Sophocles.

A DISCOVERY, as, indeed, the word implies, is a change from unknown to known, happening between those characters whose happiness, or unhappiness, forms the catastrophe of the drama, and terminating in friendship or enmity.

DISCOVE-

The best fort of Discovery is that which is accompanied by a Revolution³, as in the Occlipus.

There are, also, other Discoveries; for inanimate things, of any kind, may be recognized in the same manner ; and we may discover whether such a particular thing was, or was not, done by such a person:—but the Discovery most appropriated to the fable, and the action, is that above defined; because such Discoveries, and Revolutions, must excite either pity or terror; and Tragedy we have defined to be an imitation of pitiable and terrible actions: and because, also, by them the event, bappy, or unbappy, is produced.

Now Discoveries, being relative things, are sometimes of one of the persons only, the other being already known; and sometimes they are reciprocal: thus, Iphigenia is discovered to Orestes by the letter which she charges him to deliver, and Orestes is obliged, by other means, to make himself known to her.

- ³ Such is the diffeovery of Joseph, by his brethren, Gen. xlv.—the most beautiful and affecting example that can be given.
- 4 I do not understand Aristotle to be here speaking of such discoveries of "ina-"nimate things" (rings, bracelets, &c.) as are the means of bringing about the true discovery—that of the persons. For, in what follows, it is implied that these "other "forts of discovery" produce neither terror nor pity, neither happiness nor unhappiness; which can by no means be said of such discoveries as are instrumental to the personal discovery, and, through that, to the catastrophe of the piece. Of these, he treats afterwards, Sect. 16.—Dacier, I think, has mistaken this.
 - See Mr. Potter's Euripides:—Iphigenia in Tauris, v. 799, &c.

These then are two parts of the sable—Revolution and Disco-Disasters. There is a third, which we denominate, Disasters. The two sormer have been explained. Disasters comprehend all printul or described actions; the exhibition of death, bodily anguish, wounds, and every thing of that kind.

Χ.

PARTS into which Tragedy is DI-VIDED. The parts of Tragedy which are necessary to constitute its quality, have been already enumerated. Its parts of quantity—the diffinet parts into which it is divided—are these: Prologue, Erisode, Exode, and Chorus; which last is also divided into the Parode, and the Stasimon. These are common to all Tragedies. The Common are found in fome only.

The Proligue is all that part of a Tragedy which precedes the Parode of the Chorus.—The Epifode, all that part which is included between entire Choral Odes.—The Exode, that part which has no Choral Ode after it.

Of the Cheral part, the Parode? is the first speech of the whole Choras: the Stasimon, includes all those Choral Odes that are without Anaposis and Trochees.

The Commos², is a general lamentation of the Chorus and the Astors together.

- * Pr ligue-This may be compared to our first act. See MOTE 40.
- ⁷ Epifede—i. e. a part introduced, inferted, &c. as all the dialogue was, originally, between the choral odes. See Part I. Sect. 7. Note 7.
- * Existe—i. e. the going out, or exit: the concluding act, as we should term it. The Greek tragedies never finished with a choral ode.
- ⁹ Parode—i. c. entry of the Chorus upon the flage: and hence the term was applied to what they first sung, upon their entry. See the NOVE.
- * Stafmon—i. c. flable: because, as it is explained, these odes were sung by the choral troop when fixed on the stage, and at rest: whereas the Parade is said to have been sung, as they came on. Hence, the trochaic and anapostic measures, being lively and sull of motion, were adapted to the Parade, but not to the Stafmon.
 - * From a verb fignifying to beat or firike; alluding to the geffures of violent grief.

 Such

Such are the feparate parts into which Tragedy is divided. Its parts of quality were before explained.

XI.

The order of the subject leads us to consider, in the next place, what the Poet should aim at, and what avoid, in the construction of his sable; and by what means the purpose of Tragedy may be best effected.

What CA-TASTRO-PHE, and what CHA-RACTER, belt adapted to the purputes of Trajedy.

Now fince it is requifite to the perfection of a Tragedy that its plot should be of the complicated, not of the simple kind, and that it should imitate such actions as excite terror and pity, (this being the peculiar property of the Tragic imitation,) it follows evidently, in the first place, that the change from prosperity to adversity should not be represented as happening to a virtuous character3; for this railes difgust, rather than terror, or compassion. Neither should the contrary change, from adversity to prosperity, be exhibited in a vitious character: this, of all plans, is the most oppofite to the genius of Tragedy, having no one property that it ought to have; for it is neither gratifying in a moral view, nor affecting, nor terrible. Nor, again, should the fall of a very bad man from prosperous to adverse fortune be represented: because, though fuch a subject may be pleasing from its moral tendency, it will produce neither pity nor terror. For our pity is excited by misfortunes undefervedly fuffered, and our terror, by foine refemblance between the fufferer and ourselves. Neither of these effects will, therefore, be produced by fuch an event.

There remains, then, for our choice, the character between these extremes; that of a person neither eminently virtuous or just, nor yet, involved in missortune by deliberate vice, or villainy; but by some error of human frailty: and this person should, also, be some one of high same and slourishing prosperity. For example, OEDIPUS, THYESTES, or other illustrious men of such samilies.

i. e. eminently virtuous, or good: for so he expresses it at the end of this section.

XII. Hence

XII.

CATAS-TROPHE fhould be single, and that UN-HAPPY. Hence it appears, that, to be well conftructed, a fable, contrary to the opinion of some, should be fingle rather than double; that the change of fortune should not be from adverse to prosperous, but the reverse; and that it should be the consequence, not of vice, but of some great frailty, in a character such as has been deferibed, or better rather than worse.

These principles are confirmed by experience; for Poets, formerly, admitted almost any story into the number of Tragic subjects; but now, the subjects of the best Tragedies are confined to a few families—to Alcmæon, Oedipus, Orestes, Meleager, Thyestes, Telephus, and others, the sufferers, or the authors, of some terrible calamity.

The most perfect Tragedy, then, according to the principles of the art, is of this construction. Whence appears the mistake of those critics who censure Euripides for this practice in his Tragedies, many of which terminate unhappily; for this, as we have shewn, is right. And, as the strongest proof of it, we find that upon the stage, and in the dramatic contests, such Tragedies, if they succeed, have always the most Tragic effect: and Euripides, though, in other respects, faulty in the conduct of his subjects, seems clearly to be the most Tragic of all Poets.

I place in the fecond rank, that kind of fable to which some assign the first; that which is of a double construction, like the Odyssey, and also ends in two opposite events, to the good, and to the bad, characters. That this passes for the best, is owing to the weakness of the spectators, to whose wishes the Poets accommodate 4 What is here meant by a fingle fable, will appear presently from the account of its opposite—the dowle fable. It must not be confounded with the fimple fable, though, in the original, both are expressed by the same word. The fimple fable is only a fable without revisition, or discovery. Sect. 8.

That weakness which cannot bear strong emotions, even from sicilitious distress. I have known those who could not look at that admirable picture, the Ugolino of Sir Loc date their productions. This kind of pleasure, however, is not the proper pleasure of Tragedy, but belongs rather to Comedy; for there, if even the bitterest enemies, like Orestes and Ægisthus, are introduced, they quit the scene at last in perfect friendship, and no blood is shed on either side.

XIII.

Terror and pity may be raised by the decoration—the mere spectacle ; but they may also arise from the circumstances of the action itself; which is far preserable, and shews a superior Poet. For the sable should be so constructed, that, without the assistance of the sight, its incidents may excite horror and commisseration in those, who bear them only: an effect, which every one, who hears the sable of the Oedipus, must experience. But, to produce this effect by means of the decoration, discovers want of art in the Poet; who must also be supplied, by the public, with an expensive apparatus.

TERROR and PITY to be excited by the AcTION, not by the DECORATION.

As to those Poets, who make use of the decoration in order to produce, not the terrible, but the marvellous only, their purpose has nothing in common with that of Tragedy. For we are not to seek for every fort of pleasure from Tragedy, but for that only which is proper to the species.

Jos. Reynolds.—To some minds, every thing, that is not chearful, is shocking.—But, might not the preference here attributed to weakness, be attributed to better causes—the gratification of philanthropy, the love of justice, order, &c.?—the same causes which, just before, induced Aristotle himself to condemn, as shocking, and disgusting, those sables which involve the virtuous in calamity.

- ⁶ See a very pleasant paper of Addison's on this subject, Spessator N° 42. We know the effect of the skull and black hangings in the Fair Penitent, the scassfold in Venice Preserved, the tomb in Romeo and Juliet, &c.
- ⁷ Among other public offices, which the wealthier citizens of Afhens were, by turns, called upon to discharge, was that of the Charagi, who were obliged, at their own expence, to provide a charus, dreffes, and, perhaps, thenes, and the whole decoration of theatrical exhibitions.

N Since,

Since, therefore, it is the business of the Tragic Poet to give that pleasure, which arises from pity and terror, through imitation, it is evident, that he ought to produce that effect by the circumstances of the action itself.

XIV.

Of DISASTROUS INCIDENTS, and their proper management.

Let us, then, fee, of what kind those incidents are, which appear most terrible, or piteous.

Now, fuch actions must, of necessity, happen between persons who are either friends, or enemies, or indifferent to each other. If an enemy kills, or purposes to kill, an enemy, in neither case is any commisseration raised in us , beyond what necessarily arises from the nature of the action itself.

The case is the same, when the persons are neither friends nor enemies. But when such disasters happen between friends —when, for instance, the brother kills, or is going to kill, his brother, the son his father, the mother her son, or the reverse—these, and others of a similar kind, are the proper incidents for the Poet's choice. The received Tragic subjects, therefore, he is not at liberty effentially to alter; Clytamnestra must die by the hand of Orestes, and Eriphyle by that of Alemaon: but it is his province to invent other subjects, and to make a skilful use of those which he finds already established.—What I mean by a skilful use, I proceed to explain.

The atrocious action may be perpetrated knowingly and intentionally, as was usual with the earlier Poets; and as EURIPIDES, also, has represented Medea destroying her children.

- * i. e. any of that degree of commiseration, which is requisite to the effect of the deepest tragedy, such as is the subject of this section. See NOTE 102.
- ⁹ Aristotle uses this word here, and in other parts of his works, in a wide sense, including relations, &c.
 - * As in Macbeth, Richard the Third, &c.
 - ² See Mr. Potter's translation of the Tragedy here alluded to.

It may, likewise, be perpetrated by those, who are ignorant, at the time, of the connection between them and the injured person, which they afterwards discover³; like Oedipus, in Sophocles. There, indeed, the action itself does not make a part of the drama⁴: the Alemaon of Asydamas, and Telegonus in the Ulysses Wounded, furnish instances within the Tragedy⁵.

There is yet a third way, where a person upon the point of perpetrating, through ignorance, some dreadful deed, is prevented by a sudden discovery.

Beside these, there is no other proper way. For the action must of necessity be either done, or not done, and that, either with know-ledge, or without: but of all these ways *, that of being ready to execute, knowingly, and yet not executing, is the worst; for this is, at the same time, shocking, and yet not Tragic, because it exhibits no disastrous event. It is, therefore, never, or very rarely, made use of. The attempt of Hæmon to kill Creon, in the Antigone, is an example.

Next to this, is the actual execution of the purpose *.

- s As in the Fatal Curiofity of Lillo.
- The murder of Laius by Oedipus, his fon, is supposed to have happened a considerable time before the beginning of the action.
- Of the two dramas nothing more is known than the little that Aristotle here tells us. In the first, the Poct adhered so far to history, as to make Alemzon kill his mother Eriphyle, but with the improvement, (according to Aristotle's idea,) of making him do it ignorantly. The story of Telegonus is, that he was a son of Ulysses by Girce; was sent by her in quest of his father, whom he wounded, without knowing him, in a skirmish relative to some sheep, that he attempted to carry off from the island of Ithaca. It is somewhat singular, that the wound is said to have been given with a kind of Otaheite spear, headed with a sharp sish-bone. See Pope's Odyssey XI. 167. and the note.
 - As in Merope; Aristotle's own example.
- * There is here much embarraffment and confusion in the original. See WOTE 105.
 - 7 Of Sophocles. See Franklin's, or Brumoy's, translation.
- The first of the three proper and admissible ways that were enumerated; that of Macheth, &c.

To execute, through ignorance, and afterwards to discover, is better: for thus, the shocking atrociousness is avoided, and, at the same time, the discovery is striking.

But the best of all these ways, is the last. Thus, in the Tragedy of Cresphontes, Merope, in the very act of putting her son to death, discovers him, and is prevented. In the Iphigenia, the sister, in the same manner, discovers her brother; and in the Helle, the son discovers his mother, at the instant when he was going to betray her.

On this account it is, that the subjects of Tragedy, as before remarked, are confined to a small number of families. For it was not to art, but to fortune², that Poets applied themselves, to find incidents of this nature. Hence the necessity of having recourse to those families, in which such calamities have happened.

Of the PLOT, or FABLE, and its requisites, enough has now been said.

XV.

Of the Manners. With respect to the Manners, four things are to be attended to by the Poet.

First, and principally, they should be good. Now manners, or character, belong, as we have said before, to any speech or action that manifests a certain disposition; and they are bad, or good, as the disposition manifested is bad, or good. This goodness of manners may be found in persons of every description³: the manners of a woman, or of a slave, may be good; though, in general, women are, perhaps, rather bad, than good, and slaves, altogether bad.

The

- The Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides.
- Of this Tragedy nothing farther is known.
- ² i. e. to history or tradition.—See above, Seet. 6. p. 82. and Seet. 12. p. 88.
- ³ This is observed, to shew the consistence of this first precept with the next. The manners must be drawn as good as may be, consistently with the observance of protriety, with respect to the general character of different sexes, ages, conditions, &c.

The fecond requisite of the manners, is propriety. There is a manly character of bravery and fierceness, which cannot, with propriety, be given to a woman.

The third requisite is resemblance; for this is a different thing from their being good, and proper, as above described.

The fourth, is uniformity; for even though the model of the Poet's imitation be some person of ununiform manners, still that person must be represented as uniformly ununiform.

We have an example of manners unnecessarily had, in the character of Menelaus in the Tragedy of Orestes': of improper and unbecoming manners, in the lamentation of Ulysses in Scylla, and in the speech of Menalippe's of ununiform manners, in the Iphigenia

It might have been objected—"You say, the character must be good. But suppose the Poet has to represent, for instance, a slave?—the character of slaves in general is notoriously bad."—The answer is,—any thing may be good in its kind.

- ⁴ That is, the manners may be both good, and proper or becoming; and yet not like. For example; should a Poet draw Medea, gentle, patient, &c. the manners would be both good, and becoming, but not like—not conformable to the historical or traditional character of the individual. The portrait would be defective.
- ⁵ The Orefles of Euripides.—Menelaus, throughout this play, as Mr. Potter has justly remarked, is "represented as an ungrateful, unfeeling, timid, defigning pol-"tron."
- The author had here, no doubt, given an inflance of the violation of resemblance in the manners, though it be wanting in all the manuscripts.—Of the Scylla, nothing is known.—Some fragments remain of the Menalippe the Wise, (for this was the title,) a Tragedy of Euripides, the subject of which is a curiosity. Menalippe was delivered of two children, the fruits of a stolen amour with Neptune. To conceal her share, she hid them in her sather's cow-house; where he found them, and, being less of a philosopher than his daughter, took them for a monstrous production of some of his cows, and ordered them to be burned. His daughter, in order to save them, without exposing herself, enters into a long physical argument, upon the principles of Anaxagoras, to cure her father of his unphilosophical prejudices about moniters, and portentous births, and to convince him, that these infants might be the natural children of his cows. Part of this very speech is preserved by Dionysius of Halicarnassius, [See the Ox. Eurip. vol. iii. p. 371.] and it is this masculine philosophy that is here understood to be censured as an impropriety of character.—How would a Tragedy on such a subject as this, be now received by an audience?

[MACHI-MERY.] at Aulis; for there, the Iphigenia, who supplicates for life, has no resemblance to the Iphigenia of the conclusion.

In the manners, as in the fable, the Poet should always aim. either at what is necessary, or what is probable; so that such a character shall appear to speak or act, necessarily, or probably, in fuch a manner, and this event, to be the necessary or probable confequence of that.—' Hence it is evident, that the development also of a fable should arise out of the fable itself, and not depend upon machinery, as in the Medea⁸, or in the incidents relative to the return of the Greeks, in the Iliad'. The proper application of machinery is to fuch circumstances, as are extraneous to the drama; fuch, as either happened before the time of the action, and could not, by human means, be known; or, are to happen after, and require to be foretold: for to the Gods we attribute the knowledge of all things. But nothing improbable should be admitted in the incidents of the fable; or, if it cannot be avoided, it should, at least, be confined to such as are without the Tragedy itself; as in the Oedipus of Sophocles.

Since Tragedy is an imitation of what is best, we should follow the example of skilful portrait-painters; who, while they express the peculiar lineaments, and produce a likeness, at the same time improve upon the original. And thus, too, the Poet, when he

- What follows, to the end of the paragraph, appears rather out of place. But fee the NOTE. For development, fee Sect. 18.
- ⁸ Of Euripides. Medea is carried off, at the end of the Tragedy, in a chariot drawn by flying dragons. See Mr. Potter's Transl. v. 1443, &c.
- 9 Pope's Iliad, II. 189, &c.—if the text here is right: but this is doubtful. See the NOTE.
- By incidents of the fable, Aristotle here plainly means, all those actions or events which are effectial parts of the fubject or story, whether previous to the action, and necessary to be known, or included in it, and actually represented in the drama. Compare Part III. Sect. 6.
- ² This feems intended to explain his third precept, of refemblance in the manners; to reconcile it with his firfl, and to flew what firt of likeness the nature of Tragic imitation requires.—Compare Part I. Sect. 3.—and Part IV. Sect. 5.

imitates]

imitates the manners of pallionate men, (or of indolent, or any other of a fimilar kind,) should draw an example approaching rather to a good, than to a hard and ferocious character: as Achilles is drawn, by AGATHO, and by HOMER. These things the Poet should keep in view; and, befides these, whatever relates to those fenses* which have a necessary connection with Poetry: for here, also, he may often err.—But of this enough has been said in the treatifes already published.

XVI.

What is meant by a DISCOVERY, has already been explained. Different Its kinds are the following.

DISCOVE-

First, the most inartificial of all, and to which, from poverty of invention, the generality of Poets have recourfe—the discovery by visible signs. Of these signs, some are natural; as, the lance with which the family of the earth-born Thebans4 were marked, or the stars which Carcinus has made use of in his Thyestes: others are adventitious; and of these, some are corporal, as scars; fome external, as necklaces, bracelets, &c. or the little boat by which the discovery is made in the Tragedy of Tyros. Even

- * i. e. To the fight, and the hearing; in other words, to actual reprefentation. See the NOTE.
- ³ The reader, who recollects the conclusion of Sect. 14, where the author took a formal leave of the "fable and its requisites," and proceeded to the second effential part of Tragedy, the manners, will hardly be of Dacier's opinion, who contends, that this fection is rightly placed. His reasons are persectly unsatisfactory.
- 4 The descendants of the original Thebans, who, according to the fabulous history, forung from the earth when Cadmus fowed the Dragon's teeth, &c. - This noble race are faid to have been diffinguished by the natural mark of a lance upon their bodies.
- ⁵ Sophocles wrote two Tragedies of this name, neither of them preserved.— The flory of Tyro leads us to suppose, that Aristotle means the little boat, trough, or, as some render it, cradle, in which Tyro had exposed her children, on, or near, the river: the particular manner of the discovery, it would be in vain to guess.

thefe.

these, however, may be employed with more, or less skill. The discovery of Ulysses, for example, to his nurse, by means of his scar, is very different from his discovery, by the same means, to the herdsmen. For all those discoveries, in which the sign is produced by way of proof, are inartisicial. Those, which, like that in the Washing of Ulysses, happen suddenly and casually, are better.

Secondly—Discoveries invented, at pleasure, by the Poet, and, on that account, still inartificial. For example; in the Iphigenia, Orefles, after having discovered his sister, discovers himself to her. She, indeed, is discovered by the letter; but Orestes, by [verbal proofs:] and these are such, as the Poet chuses to make him produce, not such, as arise from the circumstances of the fable. This kind of discovery, therefore, borders upon the fault of that first mentioned: for, some of the things from which those proofs are drawn, are even such, as might have been actually produced as visible signs.

Another instance, is the discovery by the sound of the shuttle in the Tereus of Sophocles.

Thirdly—The Discovery occasioned by memory; as, when some recollection is excited by the view of a particular object. Thus, in the Cyprians of Dicaogenes, a discovery is produced by tears shed at the fight of a picture: and thus, in the Tale of Alcinous, Ulysses, listening to the bard, recollects, weeps, and is discovered.

- ⁶ See Pope's Odyffey, XIX. v. 451, &c. and the note there, on v. 461, and XXI. 226.
- ⁷ The antients diffinguished the different parts of Homer's Poems by different titles accommodated to the different subjects, or episodes; and, in referring to him, they made use of these, not of the division into books. Thus, the part of the xixth book of the Odyssey above referred to, was called The Washing. The Tale of Alcinous was another title, which will presently be mentioned: See the NOTE on that passage.
 - 8 See Mr. Potter's translation of the Iphigenia in Tauris, v. 884 to 910.
 - ³ Pope's Odyssey, VIII. 569, &c.

Fourthly—The Discovery occasioned by reasoning or inserence; fuch as that in the Chorphoræ: "The person, who is arrived, re"sembles me—no one resembles me but Orestes—it must be he!"
And that of Polyides the Sophist, in his Iphigenia; for the conclusion of Orestes was natural.—"It had been his sister's lot to be facrificed, and it was now his own!" That, also, in the Tydeus of Theodestes:—"He came to find his son, and he himself must perish!" And thus, the daughters of Phineus, in the Tragedy denominated from them, viewing the place to which they were led, inser their sate:—"there they were to die, for there they were exposed!" There is also a compound fort of discovery, arising from salse inference in the audience; as in Ulysses the False Messinger: he asserts, that he shall know the bow, which he had not seen; the audience falsely inser, that a discovery, by that means, will follow."

But, of all Discoveries, the best is that, which arises from the action itself, and in which a striking effect is produced by probable incidents. Such is that in the Occlipus of Sophocles: and that in the Iphigenia; for nothing more natural than her desire of con-

- * Occasioned by reasoning;—i. e. by reasoning, (or rather, inference, or conclusion,) in the person discovered. See the NOTE.—It should be remembered, that Aristotle is not, in this chapter, inventing discoveries, nor enumerating all the kinds possible or practicable; but only classing and examining such, as he found in use, or could recollect, in the Tragedies and Epic Poems of his time.
- ² The subject appears to have been the same, as that of the Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides. We are to suppose, that Orestes was discovered to his fifter by this natural exclamation, at the moment when he was led to the alter of Diana to be facilised.
- ³ Of this, and the preceding Tragedy, we know nothing, but what we learn here: i. e. that in the one, a father, and in the other, the daughters of Phineus, were discovered, and, probably, faved, by those exchanations.
- 4 The original here is all incurable corruption, and impenetrable obfensity. See the NOTE.

veying the letter. Such discoveries are the best, because they alone are effected without the help of invented proofs, or bracelets, &cc.5.

Next to these, are the discoveries by inference.

XVII.

PRACTICAL DIRECTIONS for the TRAGIC POET.

The Poet, both when he plans, and when he writes, his Tragedy, should put himself, as much as possible, in the place of a spectator; for, by this means, seeing everything distinctly, as if present at the action, he will discern what is proper, and no inconsistences will escape him. The fault objected to Carcinus is a proof of this. Amphiaraus had left the temple : this, the Poet, for want of conceiving the action to pass before his eyes, overlooked; but in the representation, the audience were disgusted, and the piece condemned.

In composing, the Poet should even, as much as possible, be an after: for, by natural sympathy, they are most persuasive and affecting, who are under the influence of actual passion. We share the agitation of those, who appear to be truly agitated—the anger of those, who appear to be truly angry.

Hence it is, that Poetry demands, either great natural quickness of parts, or an enthusiasm allied to madness. By the sirst of these, we mould ourselves with facility to the imitation of every form; by the other, transported out of ourselves, we become what we imagine.

When the Poet invents a subject, he should, sirst, draw a general sketch of it, and afterwards give it the detail of its Episodes, and extend it. The general argument, for instance, of the Iphi-

- 5 All this is extremely perplexing. I must refer the reader to the NOTE;—but, certainly, with no promise of any thing like perfect satisfaction.
- 6 As the subject of this Tragedy is not known, it seems impossible, from what is here said, even to guess how this was.

genia,

"point of being facrificed, is imperceptibly conveyed away from the altar, and transported to another country, where it was the custom to facrifice all strangers to Diana. Of these rites she is appointed priestes. It happens, some time after, that her brother arrives there." But why?—because an oracle had commanded him, for some reason exterior to the general plan. For what purpose?—This, also, is exterior to the plan.—"He arrives, is seized, and, at the instant that he is going to be facrificed, the discovery is made."—And this may be, either in the way of Euripides, or like that of Polyides, by the natural resection of Orestes, that—"it was his sate also, as it had been his sister's, to be facrificed;" by which exclamation he is saved.

After this, the Poet, when he has given names to his characters, should proceed to the Episodes of his action; and he must take care, that these belong properly to the subject; like that of the madness of Orestes, which occasions his being taken, and his escape by means of the ablution. In dramatic Poetry the Episodes are short; but, in the Epic, they are the means of drawing out the poem to its proper length. The general story of the Odyssey, for example, lies in a small compass: "A certain man is supposed to be absent from his own country for many years— he is persecuted by Neptune, deprived of all his companions, and lest alone. At home, his affairs are in disorder—the suitors of his wife distipating his wealth, and plotting the destruction of his son. Tossed by many tempests, he at length arrives, and, making himself known to some of his family, attacks his ene-

⁷ In Tauris.—The general spirit of this precept of Aristotle is well illustrated by Diderot in the Essai sur la Poesse Dram. at the end of his Pere de Famille, p. 292, &c. "Surtout, s'imposer la loi de ne pas jeter sur le papier une seule idée de detai", "que le plan ne soit arreté," &c.

⁸ See the preceding fection.

⁹ See v. 301, &c. and v. 1248, &c. of Mr. Potter's translation.

"mies, destroys them, and remains himself in safety." This is the effential; the rest is Episode.

XVIII.

COMPLICATION and DEVELOPMENT of the Plot.

Every Tragedy confifts of two parts—the complication, and the development'. The complication is often formed by incidents supposed prior to the action, and by a part, also, of those that are within the action; the rest, form the development. I call complication, all that is between the beginning of the piece, and the last part, where the change of fortune commences:—development, all between the beginning of that change, and the conclusion. Thus, in the Lynceus of Theodectes, the events antecedent to the action, and the seizure of the child, constitute the complication; the development is from the accusation of murder to the end².

XIX.

Different KINDS of TRACEDY,

There are four kinds of Tragedy, deducible from so many parts, which have been mentioned. One kind is the COMPLICATED; where all depends on revolution and discovery: another is the DISASTROUS³, such as those on the subject of Ajax or Ixion: another, the MORAL⁴, as the Phthiotides, and the Peleus: and, fourthly, the SIMPLE, such as the Phoreides⁵, the Prometheus, and all those Tragedies, the scene of which is laid in the infernal regions.

Ιt

- Literally, the tying, and untying. With the French, Naud, and Denouement, are convenient and established terms. I hope I shall be pardoned for avoiding our awkward expressions of the intrigue and unravelling of a plot, &c. I could find no terms less exceptionable than those I have used.
 - · Of the plet of this Tragedy nothing is known. See the NOTE.
 - 5 For these two kinds, see above, Sect. 8, and 9.
- * i. c. In which the delineation of manners or character is predominant. See the NOTE.—Our language, I think, wants a word to express this sense of the Greek 'nouse, and the Latin, moratum. Mannered, has, I believe, sometimes been used in this sense; but so seldom, as to sound awkwardly. We know nothing of the subjects here given as examples.
 - 5 Æfchylus wrote a Tragedy fo named. It is difficult to imagine what he could make

It should be the Poet's aim to make himself master of all these manners; of as many of them, at least, as possible, and those the best: especially, considering the captious criticism, to which, in these days, he is exposed. For, the public, having now seen different Poets excel in each of these different kinds, expect every single Poet to unite in himself, and to surpass, the peculiar excellences of them all.

One Tragedy may justly be confidered as the same with another, or different, not according as the subjects, but, rather, according as the complication and development, are the fame or different.-Many Poets, when they have complicated well, develop badly. They should endeavour to deserve equal applause in both.

XX.

We must also be attentive to what has been often mentioned, Too great and not construct a Tragedy upon an Epic plan. By an Epic plan, EXTENT of Plan to be I mean, a fable composed of many fables, as if any one, for avoided.

EXTENT of

make of these three curious personages, who were born old women, lived under ground, and had but one eye among them, which they used by turns; carrying it, I suppose, in a case, like a pair of spectacles,—Such is the tale! See Mr. Potter's Æschylus, p. 49, quarto.

- 6 What follows feems rather to belong to the preceding fection. But perhaps Aristotle was led to this observation here, by what he had just dropped about the unfair and cavilling criticism of the times, which probably, (as Dacier has remarked,) denied the praife of invention to those who composed Tragedies upon old subjects, with old titles, which, we fee, was the common practice of the Greek Poets.
- 7 No fault fo common: fee NOTE 59.—It was with the Greek Tragedians. probably, as with Shakfpeare.—" In many of his plays the latter part is evidently " neglected. When he found himself near the end of his work, and in view of his "reward, he shortened the labour, to shatch the profit. He therefore remits his " efforts where he should most vigorously exert them, and his catastrophe is impro-"bably produced, or imperfectly represented." Johnson's Pref. to Shak/peare.
 - * See Part I. Sect. 9.—II. Sect. 7.
- 9 i. e .- of many diffinct parts, or Episodes, each of them capable of furnishing a Tragic fable. Compare Part III, Sect. 1. and V. Sect. 3. about the want of firies unity in the epic fable.

instance, instance, should take the entire fable of the ILIAD for the subject of a Tragedy. In the Epic Poem, the length of the whole admits of a proper magnitude in the parts; but in the drama, the effect of such a plan is far different from what is expected. As a proof of this, those Poets, who have formed the whole of the destruction of Troy into a Tragedy, instead of confining themfelves (as Euripides, but not Æschylus, has done, in the story of Niobe,) to a part, have either been condemned in the representation, or have contended without fuccess. Even Agatho has failed on this account, and on this only; for, in revolutions, and in actions also of the simple kind, these Poets succeed wonderfully in what they aim at; and that is, the union of Tragic effect with moral tendency: as when, for example, a character of great wisdom, but without integrity, is deceived, like Sifyphus; or, a brave, but unjust man, conquered. Such events, as Agatho fays, are probable, "as "it is probable, in general, that many things should happen con-" trary to probability."

XXI.

Of the Chorus.

The Chorus should be considered as one of the persons in the drama'; should be a part of the whole, and a sharer in the action: not as in Euripides', but, as in Sophocles. As for other Poets—

Actoris partes chorus, officiumque virile Defendat: neu quid medios intercinat actus, Quod nen proposito conducat & barcat aptè.

Hor. A. P. 193.

This expression does not, I think, necessarily imply any stronger censure of Euripides, than that the Choral Odes of his Tragedies were, in general, more loosely connected with the subject, than those of Sophoeles; which, on examination, would, I believe, be found true. For, that this is the sault here meant, not the improper "choice of the persons who compose the Chorus," as the ingenious translator of Euripides understands, is, I think, plain from what immediately follows; the connection being this:—"Sophoeles is, in this respect, most persect; Euripides less to; as to the others, "their choral songs are totally foreign to the subject of their Tragedies." See Mr. Potter's Euripides—Possscript to the Trojan Dames. Dr. Warton's Essay on the Genius, &c. of Pope, vol. i. p. 71.

their

their choral fongs have no more connection with their fubject, than with that of any other Tragedy: and hence, they are now become detached pieces, inferted at pleasure 3: a practice first introduced by Agatho. Yet where is the difference, between this arbitrary infertion of an Ode, and the transposition of a speech, of even of a whole Epifode, from one Tragedy to another?

XXII.

Of the other parts of Tragedy enough has now been faid. Of the We are next to consider the Diction, and the Sentiments.

SENTI-MENTS.

For what concerns the fentiments, we refer to the principles laid down in the books on Rhetcric; for to that subject they more properly belong. The fentiments include whatever is the object of speech 4; as, for instance, to prove, to consute, to move the pasfions—pity, terror, anger, and the like; to amplify, or to diminish. But it is evident, that, with respect to the things themselves also', when the Poet would make them appear pitiable, or terrible, or great, or probable, he must draw from the same sources; with this difference only, that, in the drama, these things must appear to be fuch, without being theren to be fuch '; whereas, in

- ³ It is curious to trace the gradual extinction of the Chorus. At first, it was all; then, relieved by the intermixture of dialogue, but still principal; then, subordinate to the dialogue; then digreffive, and ill connected with the piece; then borrowed from other pieces at pleasure—and so on, to the fiddles and the act-tunes, at which Dacier is fo angry. (See his Note p. 335.) The performers in the orcheftra of a modern theatre, are little, I believe, aware, that they occupy the place, and may confider themselves as the lineal descendants, of the antient Charus.—Orchestra (degreea) was the name of that part of the antient theatre, which was appropriated to the Cherus. [JUL. POLLUX, IV. p. 423.]
 - 4 See Harris's Philolog. Inquiries, p. 173, &c.
- 5 Things themselves-i. e. the events, incidents, &c. of the fable, as opposed to the fentiments, or thoughts. See the NOTE.
- ⁶ The circumstances which form the fable of Lear, Othello, Oedibus, &c. are fuch, as must of themselves, always appear in the highest degree atrocious, terrible, piteous, &c. whether the Poet be a Shakspeare, or a Tate. See the NOTE.

oratory, they must be made to appear so by the speaker, and in confequence of what he fays: otherwise, what need of an orator, if they already appear so, in themselves, and not through his eloquence?

XXIII.

Of the DIC-TION. [To the end of Part II.] With respect to Diction, one part of its theory is that, which treats of the figures? of speech; such as, commanding, entreating, relating, menacing, interrogating, answering, and the like. But this belongs, properly, to the art of asting, and to the professed masters of that kind. The Poet's knowledge, or ignorance, of these things, cannot any way materially affect the credit of his art. For who will suppose there is any justice in the cavil of Protagoras—that, in the words, "The wrath, O goddess, sing," the Poet, where he intended a prayer, had expressed a command: for he insists, that to say, Do this, or do it not, is to command.—This subject, therefore, we pass over, as belonging to an art distinct from that of Poetry.

XXIV.

ANALYSIS of DIC-TION, OF LANGUAGE in general.

To ALL DICTION, belong the following parts:—the letter, the fyllable, the conjunction, the noun, the verb, the article, the cafe, the difcourse or speech.

- 1. A letter is an indivisible found; yet not all such sounds are letters, but those only that are capable of forming an intelligible found. For there are indivisible sounds of brute creatures; but no fuch sounds are called letters. Letters are of three kinds; vowels, semivowels, and mutes. The vowel, is that, which has a distinct sound without articulation?; as A, or O.—The semivowel, that which
- ⁷ Figures of speech—not in the usual sense of that expression; as appears, indeed, from his instances. See the NOTE; and Hermes, I. 8. about the modes: particularly, NOTE (c.)
 - ⁵ In the opening of the Iliad.
- ⁹ Literally, percussion: i. e. of the tongue against the palate, or teeth, the lips against the teeth, or against each other, and all the other modes of consonant articulawhich has a distinct found with articulation, as S, and R. The mute, that which, with articulation, has yet no found by itself; but joined with one of those letters that have some sound, becomes audible; as, G, and D. These all differ from each other, as they are produced by different configurations, and in different parts, of the mouth; as they are aspirated or smooth, long or short; as their tone is acute, grave, or intermediate: the detail of all which, is the business of the metrical treatises.

- 2. A fyllable, is a found without fignification, composed of a mute and a vowel: for GR, without A, is not a fyllable; with A, as GRA, it is. But these differences, also, are the subject of the metrical art.
- 3. A conjunction, is a found without fignification, * * * * * * * of fuch a nature, as, out of feveral founds, each of them fignificant, to form one fignificant found.

- 4. An article, is a found without fignification, which marks the beginning, or the end of a fentence; or diffinguishes 2, as when we fay, The word $\varphi_{\eta\mu\nu}$ —The word $\pi_{\xi\mu}$, &c.

* * * * * * * * *

5. A noun, is a found, composed of other sounds; significant, without expression of time; and of which no part is by itself significant: for even in double words, the parts are not taken in tion. See Hermes, III. 2. p. 322. where they are called "contacts." Dacier makes fad confusion here, both in his version, and his notes, by confounding the names of the confonants, when vowels are prefixed, or put after them, to make them separately pronouncible, (Te, eF, eL, &c.) with their powers in composition—as elements of words. Thus, it is strictly true, that S and R, have a found, without the assistance of a vowel, merely by their mode of articulation. But D, or G, have no found at all by themfelves. The semivowels are I, m, n, r, s. (Dion. Halicarn. De Struct. Orat. Sect. 24.)

' See Hermes, p. 239, Note (a). Here are, in the original, two definitions; one intelligible, and one unintelligible. I believe I shall easily be excused for giving the reader the intelligible definition only. See the NOTE.

² Hermes, p. 216, &c.

the sense that separately belongs to them. Thus, in the word. Theodorus, dorus is not significant.

- 6. A verb, is a found composed of other sounds;—fignificant—with expression of time—and of which, as of the noun, no part is by itself significant. Thus, in the words, man, white, indication of time is not included: in the words, he walks, he walked, &cc. it is included; the one expressing the present time, the other the past.
- 7. Cafès belong to nouns and verbs. Some cases express relation; as of, to 4, and the like: others, number; as man, or men, &c. Others relate to action or pronunciation 5: as those of interrogation, of command, &c. for, εβαδισε; [did he go?] and, βαδίζε, [go,] are verbal cases of that kind.
- 8. Discourse, or speech, is a sound significant, composed of other sounds, some of which are significant by themselves: for all discourse is not composed of verbs and nouns;—the definition of Man's, for instance. Discourse, or speech, may subsist without a verb: some significant part, however, it must contain; significant, as the word Gleon is, in, "Cleon walks."
- The name, Theodorus, is derived from Theos, God, and Doron, a gift. Yet when the word is used, it stands for neither of these ideas, but merely for the individual so named.
- 4 These only, in modern grammar, are called cases: in Aristotle, number, whether in noun or verb, and the tenses, and modes, (or moods,) of verbs, are comprehended under that term; because cases, (areasis—casus) are endings, terminations, inflections, &c. and, in the learned languages, all the above mentioned differences of meaning are expressed by different terminations. The French use chute, the literal translation of casus, in the sense of termination.—"La chute d'une periode," &c. And fall is used, in our poetical language, for a close, or cadence, in music.

That firain again—it had a dying FALL.

Merch. of Venice. And so Milton in Comus, v. 251.

- These mades, are the same which he calls figures of speech, Sect. 23. See the NOTE.
- The definition alluded to appears to be this, literally rendered: " A terrestrial animal with two feet." (ζωο: πεζου, διπεν.)

A discourse

A discourse or speech is one, in two senses; either as it signifies one thing, or, feveral things made one by conjunction. Thus, the Iliad is one by conjunction: the definition of Man, by figuifying one thing.

XXV.

Of words, some are fingle-by which I mean, composed of Different parts not fignificant; and fome double: of which last, some have Kinds of one part fignificant, and the other not fignificant; and fome, both parts fignificant. A word may also be triple, quadruple, &c. like many of those used by the Megaliota; as, Hermocaicoxanthus'. Every word is either common, or foreign, or metaphorical, or ornamental, or invented, or extended, or contracted, or altered.

WORDS.

By common words, I mean, fuch as are in general and ethablished use.—By foreign, such as belong to a different language: fo that the same word may, evidently, be both common, and foreign, though not to the same people. The word Servers, to the Cyprians is common, to us, foreign.

A METAPHORICAL word is a word transferred from its proper fense; either from genus to species, or from species to genus, or from one species to another, or in the way of analogy.

1. From genus to Species: as,

Secure in yonder port my veffel stands'.

For, to be at anchor, is one species of standing or being fixed.

- ⁷ A strange word, and how it was applied we know not. It appears to be a consolidation of three Asiatic rivers—the Hermus, the Caïcus, and the Xanthus.
- 3 See the last paragraph of NOTE 190; an observation of importance to the right understanding of this enumeration.
- ⁹ For the general fenfe, in which metaphorical is here used, see the beginning of NOTE 183.
 - From Homer, Od. A. 185.—In Pope's translation, I. 237.
 - " Far from your capital my ship resides."

This would not answer my purpose, because the metaphor is changed.

2 How widely different is the metaphor, when we talk of a ship RIDING at anchor!

P 2

2. From

2. From species to genus: as, to Ulysses,

A THOUSAND generous deeds we owe-----3.

For a thousand is a certain definite many, which is here used for many, in general.

3. From one species to another4: as,

Χαλκω οίπο ψυχην ΑΡΥΣΑΣ.

And,

ΤΑΜ' απειρεί χαλκω.

For here, the Poet uses $\tau \alpha \mu \epsilon \nu$, to cut off, instead of $\alpha \rho \nu \sigma \alpha \nu$, to draw forth, and $\alpha \rho \nu \sigma \alpha \nu$ instead of $\tau \alpha \mu \epsilon \nu$: each being a species of taking away.

4. In the way of analogy—when, of four terms, the fecond bears the fame relation to the first, as the fourth to the third; in which case, the fourth may be substituted for the fecond, and the fecond for the fourth. And, sometimes, the proper term is also introduced, besides its relative term.

Thus, a cup bears the fame relation to Bacchus, as a shield to Mars. A shield, therefore, may be called the cup of Mars, and a cup, the shield of Bacchus. Again—evening being to day, what old age is to life, the evening may be called the old age of the day, and old age, the evening of life; or, as Empedocles has expressed it, "Life's setting sun'." It sometimes happens, that there is no proper analogous term, answering to the term borrowed; which yet may be used in the same manner, as if there were. For instance: to sow, is the term appropriated to the action of dispersing Shakspeare, Com. of Errors-last scene.

³ Il. B. 272.—In Pope, II. 333.—but the metaphor is not retained.

⁴ This, and the next species, only, answer to what we call metaphor—the metaphor founded on resemblance. The two first species belong to the trope denominated, since Aristotle's time, Syneedoche.

^{5 &}quot;Thy fun is fet, thy spring is gone." GRAY-Ode on Spring.

[&]quot;Yet hath my night of life some memory."

feed upon the earth; but the dispersion of rays from the sun is expressed by no appropriated term; it is, however, with respect to the sun's light, what sowing is with respect to seed. Hence the Poet's expression, of the sun—

" ____ sowing abroad

" His heaven-created flame."

There is, also, another way of using this kind of metaphor, by adding to the borrowed word a negation of some of those qualities, which belong to it in its proper sense: as if, instead of calling a shield the cup of Mars, we should call it the wineless cup*.

An invented word, is a word never before used by any one, but coined by the Poet himself; for such, it appears, there are; as EPNYTAI for KEPATA, borns, or APHTHP † for IEPEYE, a priest.

A word is EXTENDED, when for the proper vowel a longer is fubstituted, or a syllable is inserted.—A word is CONTRACTED, when some part of it is retrenched.—Thus, $\pi \circ \lambda H \otimes \omega$, for $\pi \circ \lambda E \otimes \omega$, and $\Pi \eta \lambda H \iota \alpha \delta \delta \omega$ for $\Pi \eta \lambda \alpha \alpha \delta \delta \delta$, are extended words: contracted, such as KPI, and $\Delta \Omega$, and $\Omega \Psi^{7}$: e. g.

--- μια γινεται αμφοτερων ΟΨ 3.

An ALTERED word, is a word, of which part remains in its usual state, and part is of the Poet's making: as in $\Delta \text{E} \\ \text{EITEPON Rata } \mu\alpha\zeta o\nu^{\circ}\text{,}$ SexiTEPOS is for SexiOS.

- * For the ornamental word, or the ornament, (nooµ@-) as Aristotle calls it, the definition of which should have come in here, see NOTE 190.
- 6 i. e. Branches; which we also use for the horns of a stag. But Aristotle means a new word, not a new application merely, of a word already in use.
- + A fupplicator: literally, a prayer, taken in the fense of one who prays; as fear is used for prophet.
 - ⁷ Kg1, occurs II. E. 196.—Δω, II. A. 425.
 - ³ Part of a verse of Empedocles, quoted by Strabo, p. 364. Ed. Cas.
 - J. E. 393.

Farther; nouns are divided into masculine, seminine, and neuter. The masculine are those which end in ν , ρ , σ , or in some letter compounded of σ and a mute; these are two, ψ and ξ .—The seminine, are those which end in the vowels always long, as η , or ω ; or, in α , of the doubtful vowels: so that the masculine and the seminine terminations are equal in number; for as to ψ and ξ , they are the same with terminations in σ . No noun ends in a mute, or a short vowel. There are but three ending in ι ; μ ell, κ opper, π eweq: five ending in υ : $\pi \omega \upsilon$, $\nu \alpha \varpi \upsilon$, $\gamma \circ \nu \upsilon$, $\delta \circ \rho \upsilon$, and $\delta \upsilon$, $\delta \circ \rho \upsilon$, δ

The neuter terminate in these two last-mentioned vowels, and in y and σ .

XXVI.

O. SITIC DICTION.

The excellence of diction consists in being perspicuous without being mean. The mest perspicuous is that which is composed of common words; but, at the same time, it is mean. Such is the Poetry of Cleophon, and that of Sthenelus. That language, on the contrary, is elevated, and remote from the vulgar idiom, which employs unusual words: by unusual, I mean, forcign, metaphorical, extended—all, in short, that are not common words. Yet, should a Poet compose his diction entirely of such words, the result would be, either an ænigma, or a barbarous jargon: an ænigma, if composed of metaphors; a barbarous jargon, if composed of forcign words.—For the essence of an ænigma consists in putting together things apparently inconsistent and impossible, and, at the same time, saying nothing but what is true. Now this cannot be effected by the mere arrangement of the words; by the metaphorical use of them, it may; as in this ænigma:

A man I once beheld, [and wondering view'd,] Who, on another, brafs with fire had GLEW'D'.

With

By mere arrangement or construction of words used in their proper senses, you may produce nonsense, or ambiguity; but not, an inconsistent and impossible, yet clear, meaning.

² See the NOTE. The operation of cupping is meant, which the Greeks performed with an inftrument of trafs.

With respect to barbarism, it arises from the use of foreign words. A judicious intermixture is, therefore, requisite.

Thus, the foreign word, the metaphorical, the ornamental, and the other species before mentioned, will raise the language above the vulgar idiom, and common words will give it perspicuity. But nothing contributes more considerably to produce clearness, without vulgarity, of diction, than extensions, contractions, and alterations, of words: for here, the variation from the proper form, being unusual, will give elevation to the expression; and, at the same time, what is retained of usual speech will give it elearness. It is without reason, therefore, that some critics have censured these modes of speech, and ridiculed the Poet for the use of them; as old Enclided did, objecting, that "versisication would be an easy business, if it "were permitted to lengthen words at pleasure:"—and then giving a burlesque example of that fort of diction: as,

Undoubtedly, when these licences appear to be thus purposely used, the thing becomes ridiculous. In the employment of all the species of unusual words, moderation is necessary: for metaphors, foreign words, or any of the others, improperly used, and with a design to be ridiculous, would produce the same effect. But how great a difference is made by a proper and temperate use of such words, may be seen in beroic verse. Let any one only substitute common words in the place of the metaphorical, the foreign, and others of the same kind, and he will be convinced of the truth of what I say. For example: the same samble verse occurs in Æschylus and in Euripides; but, by means of a single alteration

+

³ Homer.

⁴ Not the Geometrician.

⁵ I have omitted the examples—two lines of incurable corruption; the "confu-66 fion" of which is "worfe confounded" by an endless variety of various readings, which, after all, are only so many different shades of nonsense. See the NOTE.

—the substitution of a foreign, for a common and usual word, one of these verses appears beautiful, the other ordinary. For Æs-chylus, in his PhiloEtetes, fays—

Φαγεδαινα, ή με σαριας ΕΣΘΙΕΙ ποδω—
The cankerous wound that eats my flesh.——

But Euripides, instead of ἐσθια [cats] uses ΘΟΙΝΑΤΑΙ.

The same difference will appear, if, in this verse,

Now be μ' ewn OAIFOS to not OYTIDANOS not AKIKYS, we substitute common words, and say,

Νυν δε μ ' εων ΜΙΚΡΟΣ τε και ΑΣΘΕΝΙΚΟΣ και ΑΕΙΔΗΣ. So, again, should we for the following,—

Διφρον ΑΕΙΚΕΛΙΟΝ καταθεις, ΟΛΙΓΗΝ τε τραωεζαν— ⁸ fubstitute this:—

Διφρον ΜΟΧΘΗΡΟΝ καταθας, ΜΙΚΡΑΝ τε τραπεζαν. Or, change—Hίονες ΒΟΟ Ω ΣΙΝ⁹—The cliffs rebellow—to Hίονες ΚΡΑΖΟΥΣΙΝ—The cliffs refound.

Ariphrades, also, endeavoured to throw ridicule upon the Tragic Poets, for making use of such expressions as no one would think of using in common speech; as, $\delta\omega\mu\alpha\tau\omega\nu$ and, instead of and $\delta\omega\mu\alpha\tau\omega\nu$: and $\Sigma E\Theta EN$ —and, $\epsilon\gamma\omega$ of NIN—and, $A\chi\iota\lambda\lambda\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ $\pi\epsilon\rho\iota$, instead of $\pi\epsilon\rho\iota$ $A\chi\iota\lambda\lambda\epsilon\omega\varsigma$, &c. Now it is precisely owing to their being not in common use, that such expressions have the effect of giving elevation to the diction. But this he did not know.

- We have neither of the Tragedies here alluded to.
- ⁷ Odyssey IX. v. 515. of the original. It is obvious that these differences cannot be preserved in a translation.
 - * Od. 7. 259.
 - P. 11. P. 265.—Pope's line is, "And diffant rocks rebellow to the roar."
 XVII. 315.
- * Aristotle's thorough contempt of the critic, and his criticism, could not have been more strongly marked than by this short and simple expression. [—εκευΦ δε τυτο πγνεω!]

To employ with propriety any of these modes of speech—the double words, the foreign, &c.—is a great excellence: but the greatest of all, is to be happy in the use of metaphor; for it is this alone which cannot be acquired, and which, consisting in a quick discernment of resemblances, is a certain mark of genius 2.

Of the different kinds of words, the double are best suited to Dithyrambic Poetry; the foreign to Heroic; the metaphorical to Iambic. In Heroic Poetry, indeed, they have all their place; but to Iambic verse³, which is, as much as may be, an imitation of common speech⁴, those words which are used in common speech are best adapted; and such are, the common, the metaphorical, and the ornamental.

Concerning TRAGEDY, and the imitation by ACTION, enough has now been faid.

- * Metaphors are, evidently, much more important, and more of the effence of Poetry, than the other forts of words. It is very casy, and very commonly practised by Poets of no genius or originality, to copy the technical language, the formulæ, as it were, of Poetry—compound epithets, obsolete words, &c. These occur but now and then: metaphorical expression is continually wanted; and the beauty, force, and novelty of it, depend on the writer's own imagination. Indeed, almost all the beauty of Poetry, as far as language is concerned, all that distinguishes the Poet of genius, from the versisier who trusts solely to his ear, and to his memory, arises from the uncommon and original use of metaphor; especially, taking that word in Aristotle's latitude, as comprehending all tropical expression. Here, however, he plainly has our metaphor chiefly in view;—the metaphor founded on resemblance.
 - ³ The verse of Tragedy. See the NOTE.
 - * See above Part I. Sect. 7.

PART III.

OF THE EPIC POEM.

I.

In what Epic and Tragic Poetry agree. NARRATION, and in bexameter verse, it is obvious, that the fable ought to be dramatically constructed, like that of Tragedy: and that it should have for its subject one entire and perfect action, having a beginning, a middle, and an end; so that, forming, like an animal, a complete whole, it may afford its proper pleasure: widely differing, in its construction, from history, which necessarily treats, not of one action, but of one time; and of all the events that happened, to one person, or to many, during that time; events, the relation of which, to each other, is merely casual. For, as the naval action at Salamis, and the battle with the Carthaginians in Sicily, were events of the same time, unconnected by any relation to a common end, or purpose; so also, in successive events, we sometimes see one thing follow another, without being connected

³ See below, Seat. 3.

² i. e. Opposed, (as appears from what follows,) to that which bistory gives. Unity of interest is effectial to the pleasure we expect from the Epic Poem; and this cannot exist, at least, in the degree required, without unity of action.

³ Compare, Part II. Sect. 5, 7, and 8.

connected to it by such relation. And this is the practice of the generality of Poets. Even in this, therefore, as we have before observed, the superiority of Homer's genius is apparent, that he did not attempt to bring the whole war, though an entire action with beginning and end, into his Poem. It would have been too vast an object, and not easily comprehended in one view; or had he forced it into a moderate compass, it would have been perplexed by its variety. Instead of this, selecting one part only of the war, he has, from the rest, introduced many Episodes—such as the catalogue of the ships, and others—by which he has diversified his Poem. Other Poets take for their subject the actions of one person, or of one period of time, or an action which, though one, is composed of too many parts. Thus, the author of the Cypriacs, and of the Little Iliad. Hence it is, that the ILIAD, and the Odyssey, each of them, furnish matter for one Tragedy.

- 4 Part II. Sect. 5.
- 9 See Part II. Sect. 4.
- 6 Because "the length of the whole would" then "not admit of a proper magnitude in "the parts;" and, thus, an Epic Poem constructed upon an historical plan, would be exactly in the same case with a Tragedy "constructed on an Epic plan," See Part II. Sect. 20. and NOTE 153.
 - 7 Part II. Sect. 5.
- ⁸ Of this kind feems the Poem of Ariosto, the exordium of which, not only expresses the miscellaneous variety of his matter, but, also, his principle of unity.

Le Donne, i cavalier, l'arme, gli amori, Le cortesse, l'audaci imprese, io canto, Che furo al TEMPO che passaro i Mori, &c.

Ariesto's expedient was, to "intertwish the several actions together, in order to give "something like the appearance of one action," to the whole, as has been observed of Spenser: [Letters on Chivalry, &c.] he has given his Poem the continuity of basket-work. Or, if I may be indulged in another comparison, his unity, is the unity produced between oil and vinegar by shaking them together; which only makes them separate by smaller portions.

9 So called, to diffinguish it from the Iliad of Homer, of which it feems to have been a continuation. See the NOTE.

or two, at most; but from the Cypriaes many may be taken, and from the Little Biad, more than eight; as, The Contest for the Armour', Philoetetes', Neoptolemus, Eurypylus', The Vagrant', The Spartan Women, The Fall of Troy, The Return of the Fleet', Sinon', and The Trojan Women'.

Again—the Epic Poem must also agree with the Tragic, as to its kinds: it must be simple, or complicated, moral, or disastrous. Its parts, also, setting aside Music and Decoration, are the same; for it requires Revolutions, Discoveries, and Disasters; and it must be surnished with proper sentiments and distion: of all which Homer gave both the first, and the most perfect, example. Thus, of his two Poems, the Iliad is of the simple and disastrous kind; the Odyssey, complicated, (for it abounds throughout with discoveries',) and moral. Add to this, that in language and sentiments he has surpassed all Poets.

- i. e. Between Ajax and Ulysses. Æschylus wrote a Tragedy on this subject, of which the Ajax of Sophocles is the sequel.—Dacier.
 - 7 The Philostetes of Sophocles only remains.
 - 3 Of the subject of this, and the preceding drama, we know nothing.
- 4 See Pope's Odyssey, IV. 335. but what is there rendered flave, is, in Homer, beggar, or vagrant. The story is also touched by Euripides, in his Heeuba. See Potter's Transl. v. 210, &c.
 - 5 See the latter part of NOTE 116.
- * The flory is well known from Virgil, En. 2.—Sophocles wrote a Tragedy of this title.
- ⁷ A Tragedy of this name by Euripides is extant. See The Trojan Dames, in Mr. Potter's translation.
 - 8 See Part II. Sect. 19.
 - 9 Part I. Sell. 9.
- See Pope's translation, XVI. 206, &c, where Ulysses discovers himself to Telamachus: XXI. 212. to the shepherds. XXIII. 211. to Penelope.—XXIV. 375. to his father.—IX. 17. to Alcinous.—IV. 150, &c. Telemachus is discovered to Menelaus by his tears: v. 189, to Helen, by his resemblance to his father.—XIX. 545. Ulysses is discovered to the old nurse, by the scar.

II. The 11.

The Epic Poem differs from Tragedy, in the length of its plan, In what and in its metre.

they DIF-FER.

With respect to length, a sufficient measure has already been affigned'. It should be fuch, as to admit of our comprehending at one view the beginning and the end: and this would be the case, if the Epic Poem were reduced from its antient length, fo as not to exceed that of fuch a number of Tragedies, as are performed successively at one hearing3. But there is a circumstance in the nature of Epic Poetry which affords it peculiar latitude in the extension of its plan It is not in the power of Tragedy to imitate feveral different actions performed at the fame time; it can imitate only that one which occupies the stage, and in which the actors are employed. But, the Epic imitation, being murative, admits of many fuch fimultaneous incidents, properly related to the subject, which fwell the Poem to a confiderable fize.

And this gives it a great advantage, both in point of magnificence, and, also, as it enables the Poet to relieve his hearer4, and diversity his work, by a variety of dissimilar Episodes: for it is to the fatiety naturally arising from similarity that Tragedies frequently owe their ill fuccess.

With respect to metre, the heroic is established by experience as the most proper; so that, should any one compose a narrative Poem in any other, or in a variety of metres, he would be thought guilty of a great impropriety. For the heroic is the gravest and most majestic of all measures; and hence it is, that it peculiarly admits the use of foreign and metaphorical expressions; for in this respect also, the narrative imitation is abundant and various beyond the rest. But the Iambic and Trochaic have more motion; the latter being adapted to dance, the other to action and business.

² See the preceding Sett. and Part II. Sect. 4.

⁹ In the dramatic contests. See the NOTE.

^{4 &}quot; Hearer."-See Differt. I. p. 42, 43.

To mix these different metres, as Chæremon has done, would be still more absurd. No one, therefore, has ever attempted to compose a Poem of an extended plan in any other than heroic verse; nature itself, as we before observed, pointing out the proper choice.

III.

Epic Narration should be DRAMA-TIC and IMITA-TIVE.

Epic admits the WON-DERFUL

and in a greater degree than Tragedy.

more eafily

Among the many just claims of Homer to our praise, this is one—that he is the only Poet who seems to have understood what part in his Poem it was proper for him to take bimself. The Poet, in his own person, should speak as little as possible; for he is not then the imitator. But other Poets, ambitious to sigure throughout, themselves, imitate but little, and seldom. Homer, after a few preparatory lines, immediately introduces a man, a woman, or some other character; for all have their character—no where are the manners neglected.

IV.

The furprifing is necessary in Tragedy +; but the Epic Poem goes farther, and admits even the improbable and incredible, from which the highest degree of the surprising results, because, there, the action is not feen *. The circumstances, for example, of the

- 5 Part I. Sect. 7.
- 6 Strictly speaking. See Differtation I. p. 26.
- ⁷ This is remarkably the case with Lucan; of whom Hobbes says, that "no "Heroic Poem raises such admiration of the Poet, as his hath done, though not so great admiration of the persons be introduceth."—[Disc. concerning the Virtues of an Heroic Poem.]
 - 8 As, gods, goddeffes, allegorical beings, &c.
 - + Sec above, Part II. Sect. 7. p. 83, 84.
- * The best comment to which I can refer the reader upon all this part of Aristotle, is to be sound in the 10th of the Letters on Chivalry and Romance, in which the Italian Poets, and the privileges of genuine Poetry, are vindicated, with as much solidity as elegance, against those, whom Dryden used to call his "Prose Critics"—against that sort of criticism "which looks like philosophy, and is net."—Dr. Hurd's Dialogues, &c. vol. iii.

purfuit of Hector by Achilles, are fuch, as, upon the stage, would appear ridiculous;—the Grecian army standing still, and taking no part in the pursuit, and Achilles making figns to them, by the motion of his head, not to interfere?. But in the Epic Poem this escapes our notice. Now the wonderful always pleases; as is evident from the additions which men always make in relating any thing, in order to gratify the hearers.

\mathbf{V}_{\cdot}

It is from Homer principally, that other Poets have learned the Fiction art of feigning well. It consists in a fort of sophism. When one thing is observed to be constantly accompanied, or followed, by another, men are apt to conclude, that, if the latter is, or has happened, the former must also be, or must have happened. But this For, knowing the latter is an error. to be true, the mind is betrayed into the false inference, that the first is true also 1.

how made to pass as

The Poet should prefer impossibilities which appear probable, to such things as, though possible, appear improbable. Far from producing

Of the IM-PROBABLE and AE⇒ SURD.

- 9 Pope's Iliad, XXII. 267.—Perhaps, the idea of stopping a whole army by a nod, or shake of the head, (a circumstance distinctly mentioned by Homer, but sunk in Mr. Pope's verfion,) was the abfurdity here principally meant. If this whole Homeric scene were represented on our stage, in the best manner possible, there can be no doubt, that the effect would justify Aristotle's observation. It would certainly set the audience in a roar.
- * For an attempt to explain Aristotle's meaning in this difficult passage, which, I think, has not hitherto been understood, I must refer the reader to the NOTE.
- ² This includes all that is called faery, machinery, ghosts, witches, enchantments, &c .- things, according to Hobbes, " beyond the actual bounds, and only within the " conceived possibility of nature." [See the Letters on Chivalry, as above.] Such a being as Caliban, for example, is impossible. Yet Shakspeare has made the character appear probable; not certainly, to reason, but to imagination: that is, we make no difficulty about the possibility of it, in reading. Is not the Lovelace of Richardson, in this ducing a plan's made up of improbable incidents, he should, if possible, admit no one circumstance of that kind; or, if he does, it should be exterior to the action itself', like the ignorance of Oedipus concerning the manner in which Laius died; not within the drama, like the narrative of what happened at the Pythian games, in the Electra'; or, in The Mysians, the man who travels from Tegea to Mysia without speaking's. To say, that without these circumstances the sable would have been destroyed, is a ridiculous excuse: the Poet should take care, from the first, not to construct his sable in that manner. If, however, any thing of this kind has been admitted, and yet is made to pass under some colour of probability, it may be allowed, though even, in itself, absurd. Thus in the Odyssey', the improbable account of the manner in which Ulysses was landed upon the shore of Ithaca, is such, as in the view, more out of nature, more improbable, than the Caliban of Shakspeare? The latter is, at least, consistent. I can imagine such a monster as Caliban: I never could imagine such a man as Lovelace.

- ³ The general plan, story, or argument, as Part II. Sect. 17. including events prior to the action, but necessary to be known.
- * See the beginning of the Oedipus of Sophocles. Though the ignorance of Oedipus appears in the drama itself, yet the circumstances, upon which the improbability of that ignorance depends (his coming to Thebes, marrying Jocasta, and living with her twenty years,) are exterior to the drama: i. c. prior to the opening of the action. See above, Part II. Sect. 15.
- 5 See Brumsy, Th. des Grecs, I. p. 428. I believe he is right in understanding the absurdity here meant to be—" d'avoir fait raconter comme inconnue, une chose dont Clytemnesser auroit pû sçavoir d'ailleurs la verité ou la fausseté, surtout s'a-" gissant d'Oreste qu'elle craignoit."—The games in question were probably frequenced by all Greece, and whatever happened at them, must have been matter of such public notoriety, that a fraudulent account would have been liable to immediate detection.
- ⁶ Of the fubject of this Tragedy, and, consequently, of the cause of the silence here censured, we are entirely ignorant.
- ⁷ See Pope's Transl. XIII. 138, and the note there, and on v. 142. Homer seems, clearly, to have imagined this circumstance, for the sake of the interesting scene which follows when Ulysses wakes. See v. 220, &c. Of the original, v. 187.

hands

hands of an ordinary Poet, would evidently have been intolerable: but here, the abfurdity is concealed under the various beauties, of other kinds, with which the Poet has embellished it.

The Diction should be most laboured in the idle parts of the Poem—those, in which neither manners, nor fentiments prevail; for the manners and the sentiments are only obscured by too splendid a diction.

- In the firistly narrative, or descriptive parts, where the Port speaks in his own person, and the imitation, the drama, which Aristotle considers as the true lustiness of Poetry, is suspended. These he calls the idle parts. The expression is applicable also to Tragedy; for though its imitation is throughout, yet every drama must have its comparatively idle parts. Such is the description above alluded to, of the chariot-race, in the Electra of Sophocles. The chorustes also may, in a great measure be so considered; and in them, accordingly, the language is "laboured" and "splendid."—In Epic Poetry, these parts are of great importance to that variety which characterizes the species. [See above, Sect. II.] In so long a work, relief is wanted, and we are glad to hear the Poet in his turn.
- o The reader may wonder that Aristotle did not add—" nor passion." But that part of the Epic and Tragic Poem, which he calls the fentiments, includes the expression of passion. See Part II. Sect. 22. And the NOTE here.
- " "His diction [Thomson's] is in the highest degree florid and luxuriant; such as "may be said to be to his images and thoughts both their lustre and their foode; such as invests them with splendour, through which perhaps they are not always castly "discerned."—Dr. Johnson's Life of Thomson.

P A R T IV.

OF CRITICAL OBJECTIONS, AND THE PRINCIPLES ON WHICH THEY ARE TO BE ANSWERED.

Ĩ.

PRINCIPLES ON which Poetry is to be DEFENDED.

SWERS to them, the number and nature of the different fources, from which they may be drawn, will be clearly understood, if we consider them in the following manner.

- 1. The Poet, being an imitator, like the painter or any other artist of that kind, must necessarily, when he imitates, have in view one of these objects;—he must represent things, fuch
- The original is, Problems. This appears to have been a common title of critical works in Aristotle's time. Objections, censures, and the most unreasonable cavils, were conveyed in the civil form of problems and questions. Thus, many criticisms on Homer were published under the title of Homeric Problems.

The fcope of this part of Aristotle's work is of more importance to his subject than, at first view, it may appear to be. In teaching how to answer criticisms, it, in fact, teaches, (as far, I mean, as it goes,) what the Poet should do to avoid giving occasion to them. It seems, indeed, intended as an applopy for Poetry, and a vindication of its privileges upon true poetical principles, at a time when the art and its professors were unfairly attacked on all sides, by the eavils of profaic philosophers and sophists, such as Ariphrades, Protagoras, Euclid, &c. and by the paritanical objections of Plato and his followers, as they were, or are 2; -or, fuch as they are faid to be, and believed to be 3,—or, fuch as they should be 4.

- 2. Again: all this he is to express in words, either common, or foreign and metaphorical—or varied by some of those many modifications and peculiarities of language, which are the privilege of Poets.
- 3. To this we must add, that what is right in the Poetic art, is a distinct consideration from what is right in the political, or any other art. The faults of Poetry are of two kinds, effential and If the Poet has undertaken to imitate without talents for inditation, his Poetry will be effentially faulty. But if he is right in applying himself to Poetic imitation, yet in imitating is occasionally wrong; as, if a horse, for example, were represented moving both his right legs at once;—or, if he has committed miglakes, or described things impossible, with respect to other arts, that of Physic, for instance, or any other—all fuch faults, whatever they may be, are not effential, but accidental faults, in the Poetry.

II.

To the foregoing considerations, then, we must have recourse, in Applicaorder to obviate the doubts and objections of the critics.

TION of the IaA Princi-

For, in the first place, suppose the Poet to have represented things ple. impossible with respect to some other art. This is certainly a fault. Yet it may be an excusable fault, provided the end of the Poet's art be more effectually obtained by it; that is, according to what has already been faid of that end, if, by this means, that, or any other part, of the Poem, is made to produce a more firiking effect's. The pursuit of Hector is an instance 6. If, indeed, this end might

- ² Compare Part I. Sect. 3.
- 3 This opens the door for the marvellous; machinery, ghosts, witches, facry, &c.
- 4 Compare Part I. Sect. 3 .- II. end of Sect. 15. and below, Sect. 5.
- 5 Which is exactly the case with Honer's improbable account of the landing of Ulysses, mentioned above, Part III. Sect. 6. See Note 7.
 - 6 Part III. Sect. 4.

as well, or nearly as well, have been attained, without departing from the principles of the particular art in question, the fault, in that case, could not be justified; since faults of every kind should, if possible, be avoided.

Still we are to confider, farther, whether a fault be in things effectial to the Poetic art, or foreign and incidental to it: for it is a far more pardonable fault to be ignerant, for inflance, that a hind has no horns?, than to paint one badly.

III.

APPLICATION of the first Principle.

Farther: If it be objected to the Poet, that he has not reprefented things conformably to truth⁸, he may answer, that he has represented them as they should be. This was the answer of Sophocles—that "he drew mankind such as they should be; Euri-"pides, such as they are." And this is the proper answer.

But if the Poet has represented things in neither of these ways, he may answer, that he has represented them as they are said and believed to be. Of this kind are the poetical descriptions of the Gods. It cannot, perhaps, be said, that they are either what is best, or what is true; but, as Xenophanes says, opinions "taken" up at random: "these are things, however, not "clearly "known."

Again—What the Poet has exhibited is, perhaps, not what is beft, but it is the fact; as in the passage about the arms of the sleeping foldiers:

Their spears stood by?.

For

[&]quot; "A bind with golden horns," is expressly mentioned by Pindar in his 3d Olymtic Ode, and by other Greek Poets. This inaccuracy in natural highery, had probably been the subject of critical cavil.

^{*} i. c. to common nature. Above, he expresses it, by "representing things such "as they were, or are."

^{*} Iliad, X. 152.—In Pope's translation, v. 170, &c.—On what account this had been

For fuch was the custom at that time, as it is now among the Hlyrians.

IV.

In order to judge whether what is faid, or done, by any cha- Comme or racter, be well, or ill, we are not to confider that speech or action at the confider that speech or action alone', whether in it/elf it be good, or bad, but also by whom it tion, how to is spoken or done, to whom, at what time, in what manner, or for be examinwhat end-whether, for inflance, in order to obtain some greater good, or to avoid some greater evil.

me chi or in-

For the folution of force objections, we must have recourse to the Apparex-110% of the For example: Diction. Twond Prin-

ΟΥΡΗΛΣ μεν πρωτον-

"On MULES and dogs the infection for began"."

POPE.

This may be defended by faying, that the Poet has, perhaps, used the word zenas in its foreign acceptation of centinels, not in its proper fense, of mules.

been objected to by the critics, we are left to guess. Dacier, after Victorius, supposes the objection to be, that the frears, so fastened in the ground, could not be readily disengaged, in case of a sudden attack. I shall only observe, that by Homer's description of the truce in the 3d book, this appears to have been the usual position of their fpears when no attack was apprehended, and in open day-light; which makes it the lefs furprifing that it should have been objected to as an impropriety in a situation of nocturnal danger, such as is described in the pallage referred to.—What Pope, III. 177, translates, " reft their spears," is, in Homer, "their spears were fixed." (-παρα δ' έγχεα μακία ΠΕΠΗΓΕΝ. ν. 135.)

- ¹ This is plainly connected with what precedes, which cannot be properly applied without taking in the confideration of character, circumflances, motives, &c .- The speech of Satan, for example, in Parad. Logl, IV. 32, taken in itself, is horrible: refurred to the charafter who freaks it, nothing can be better. It is, poetically speaking, exactly what it should be.
- ² Il. I. 69.—The reason of the objection here is not told, and has been variously gueffed by the commentators. Probably, the propriety of making the nules the first fufferers, before horses and other animals, was the matter in dispute. The objection feems frivolous, and the folution improbable.

So also in the passage where it is said of Dolon—

EIΔΟΣ μεν εην κακ 🖫 --
Of form unhappy.——

The meaning is, not, that his perfon was deformed, but, that his face was ugly; for the Cretans wie the word $\text{EYEI}\Delta\text{E}\Sigma$ —" well-" FORMED"—to express a beautiful face.

Again:

ZOPOTEPON de regaige 4---

Here, the meaning is not, "mix it flrong," as for intemperate tirinkers; but, "mix it quickly."

- 2. The following passages may be defended by METAPHOR.
 - " Now pleafing fleep had feal'd each mortal eye;
 - " Stretch'd in the tents the Grecian leaders lie;
 - "The immortals flumber'd on their thrones above "---

Pose.

Again-

- " When on the Trojan plain his anxious eye
- " Watchful he fin'd"."
- 3 Il. K. 316.—Pope, X. 375, has followed Ariftotle's interpretation.
 - " Not blest by nature with the charms of face,
 - "But fivift of foot, and matchless in the race."

The objection of the critics is fupposed to have been, that an ill-made man, could not be a good racer. See Pope's Note.

- * Iliad IX. 267, 8.—Pope follows the common, and probably the right, acceptation of the word. "Mix purer wine."—Ariflotle's interpretation has not made its fortune with the critics. He feems to have produced it rather as an exemplification of the fort of answer which he is here considering, than as an opinion in which he acquiested himself. It was, probably, an answer which had been given. The cavil, according to Plutarch, came from Zoilus. [See the Symposiae Prob. of Plut. V. 4, where this subject is discussed, and several other conjectural senses of the word Zogotages are proposed.]
- Beginning of II. II.—What it was that wanted defence in this passage, and that was to be taken metaphorically, we are not told. That it was the representation of the Go is as fleeping, is the most probable conjecture. This is somewhat softened by Mr. Pope's "flumbered." Homer says—" SLEPT all the night."—Endow παννυχιοι.
- 6 Iliad, X. v. 13. (of the Oriz. v. 11.) But Pope's version was not literal enough for my purpose. For the supposed objection, see my NOTE.

And-

And-

For, All', is put metaphorically instead of many; all being a species of many.

Here alfo-

The Bear ALONE,

- " Still shines exalted in th' ætherial plain,
- " Nor bathes his flaming forehead in the main "."

Pope.

ALONE, is metaphorical: the most remarkable thing in any kind, we speak of as the only one.

We may have recourse also,

3. Το ACCENT: as the following passage—
ΔΙΔΟΜΕΝ δε δι ἐυχ. Διρεσθαι²—

And this—το μεν ΟΥ καταπυθεται ομβρω ³—were defended by Hippias of Thasos.

⁷ Ibid. 15, 16.—Orig. 13. The fense of the example may be given, pretty closely, thus:

The distant voice of flutes and pipes he mark'd With wonder, and the "bufy bum of men."

But this does not answer exactly to the Greek, where the word, which I have rendered hum, may fignify either the hum or murmar of a multitude, or the multitude itself. See the NOTE.

- 8 As the Greek word for ALL, does not occur in any of the preceding examples, we suppose some example, corresponding to this explanation, to have been lost.
 - 9 i. e. by Synecdoche. See above, p. 107.
 - ¹ Ilial, XVIII. v. 565, 566, and fee the note there.
- ² See Pope's Iliad, II. 9, and his note. For the Jesuitical distinction of Hippias's Theology, see the NOTE.
- ³ Il. Y. 328.—Pope's transl. XXIII. 402.—" unperished with the rains." According to a different accentuation of the word OT, in the original, it would mean, "where perished with the rains."—See the NOTE.

- 4. Το PUNCTUATION; as in this passage of Empedocles:

 Αιψα δε θυητ' έφυσυτο τα πριν μαθον άθανατ' ειναι,

 ΖΩΡΑ ΤΕ ΤΑ ΗΡΙΝ ΑΚΡΗΤΑ——
- i. e. —— things, before immortal,

 Mortal became, and mix'd before unmix'd⁴,

 [Their courses changed.]
- 5. To AMBIGUITY; as in-παραχημέν δε ΠΑΕΩΝ 1025—where the word ΠΑΕΩΝ is ambiguous.
- 6. To CUSTOMARY SPEECH: thus, wine mixed with water, or whatever is poured out to drink as wine, is called OINOΣ—wine: hence, Ganymede is faid—Δ.ϊ ΟΙΝΟΧΟΕΤΕΙΝ 6—to "pour the "wine to Jove:" though wine is not the liquor of the Gods. This, however, may also be defended by metaphor.
- ⁴ The verses allude to the two great physical principles of Empedacles, which he chose to denominate friendship and strife, and in which modern philosophers have discovered the Newtonian principles of attraction and repulsion. He held everything to be formed of the sour element, and resolved into them again. Friendship was the uniting, strife, the separating, principle. The elements themselves, in their separate and simple state, were immortal; the things compounded of them, were mortal; i. e. liable to be resolved into their sirst principles.—As far as we can make anything of this fragment, it seems intended to express the two contrary changes of things; from immortal to mortal, by the uniting principle, and from mortal to immortal, i. e. from mixed to unmixed, by the difuniting principle. But the words—"mixed before un-"mixed," will, plainly, express either of these changes, according as we place the comma, after mixed, or after lesore. It is imagined, that the critics mislook the punctuation so as to make Empedacles express only the same change in different words, and then censured this, as inconsistent with the expression, "their courses changed." [διαλλαττοτία μελευθες—changing their τουμς.]
- ⁵ Il. K. 252.—Pope's translation, X. 298. The original fays—"more than two parts of the night are past; the third part remains."—This the cavilling critics centured as a fort of bull. What is guessed to have been the answer, the reader may see, but I believe will hardly wish to see, in Dacier's notes.
 - " II. T. 234. Pope, XX. 278, &c.—He renders it—" to bear the cup of Jove."
 - ⁷ The metaphor from species to species. See p. 108.

Thus,

Thus, again, artificers in iron are called Χαλκεις—literally, brafiers. Of this kind is the expression of the Poet—Κνημις νεοτευκήν ΚΑΣΣΙΤΕΡΟΙΟ⁸.

7. When a word, in any passage, appears to express a contradiction, we must consider, in how many different senses it may there be taken. Here, for instance—

-τη ς ΈΣΧΕΤΟ χαλαεον εγχω
"There fluck the lance?."

POPE.

-the meaning is, was flopped only, or repelled.

Of how many different fenses a word is capable, may best be discovered by considering the different senses that are opposed to it.

We may also say, with Glauco, that some critics, first take things for granted without soundation, and then argue from these previous decisions of their own; and, having once pronounced their judgment, condemn, as an inconsistence, whatever is contrary to their preconceived opinion. Of this kind is the cavil of the critics concerning Icarius. Taking it for granted that he was a Lace-

- * II. D. 592.—Literally, "greaves of tin." But it is not customary speech with us, to say tin, for iron or steel. The Greek word for tin, however, appears to have been so used.—We are not here to understand the objection to have been pointed at the improper use of a word. The critics took, or pretended to take, the word in its proper sense, and thence objected to the absurdity of tin armour.
- 9 II. XX. 321.—Mr. Pope feems to have translated very accurately here, and to have preserved even the ambiguity of the original; for the verb, to flick, admits, like the Greek word, (ἐχεσθωι) of two senses;—that of being fastened to, or fixed in, and that of being flopped—prevented from going farther.—See the NOTE.

Secur'd the temper of th' ætherial arms.
Thro' two strong plates the point its passage held,
But flopp'd, and refled, by the third repell'd;
Five plates of various metal, various mold,
Compos'd the shield; of brass each outward fold,
Of tin each inward, and the middle, gold:
THERE STUCK THE LANCE."

Mentioned by Homer as the father of Penelope.

dæmonian, they thence infer the abfurdity of supposing Telemachus not to have seen him when he went to Lacedæmon². But, perhaps, what the Cephalenians say may be the truth. They affert, that the wise of Ulvsses was of their country, and that the name of her father was not Icarius, but Icadius. The objection itself, therefore, is probably sounded on a mistake.

VI.

Censure of Impossible LITY farther considered,

The Impossible, in general, is to be justified by referring, either to the end of Poetry itself, or to what is best, or to opinion.

For, with respect to Poetry, impossibilities, rendered probable, are preferable to things improbable, though *possible*³.

With respect also to what is best, the imitations of Poetry should resemble the paintings of Zeuxis: the example should be more perfect than nature.

To opinion, or what is commonly faid to be, may be referred even fuch things as are improbable and abfurd; and it may also be faid, that events of that kind are, sometimes, not really improbable; since "it is probable, that many things should happen "contrary to probability".

- ² See Pope's Odyssey, IV.
- ⁵ See Part III. Seet. 6. and Note 2, p. 119.
- * Improved nature, ideal beauty, &c. which, elsewhere, is expressed by, what should be. Compare the beginning of this Part, and Sect. 3.—Part I. Sect. 3.—Part II. Sect. 15. p. 94.
- 5 "In ancient days, while Greece was flourishing in liberty and arts, a celebrated painter, [Zeuxis,] having drawn many excellent pictures for a certain free state, and been generously rewarded for his labours, at last made an offer to paint them a Helen, as a model and exemplar of the most exquisite beauty. The proposal was readily accepted, when the artist informed them, that in order to draw one Fair, it was necessary he should contemplate many. He demanded therefore a sight of all their finest women. The state, to assist the work, assented to his request. They were exhibited before him; he selected the most beautiful; and from these formed his Helen, more beautiful than them all."—Harris's Three Treatises, p. 216.
 - * See Part II. Sea. 20, at the end; and NOTE 156.

VII. When

VII.

When things are faid, which appear to be contradictory, we must Inconsisexamine them as we do in logical confutation: whether the fame TENCE. thing be spoken of; whether in the same respect, and in the same fenfe. * * * * * * * * * * *

VIII.

Improbability, and vitious manners, when excused by no necessity, IMPROBAare just objects of critical censure. Such is the improbability in BILITY and the Ægeus' of Euripides, and the vitious character of Menelaus CHARACin his Orestes3.

VITIOUS TER.

Thus, the fources from which the critics draw their objections Recapitulaare five: they object to things as impossible, or improbable, or of immoral tendency, or contradictory, or contrary to technical accuracy. The answers, which are twelve in number, may be deduced from what has been faid'.

- 7 Of this Tragedy, fome inconfiderable fragments only remain.
- 8 See p. 93.
- 9 The reader, who regards his own case, will, I believe, do well to take this for granted. If however he has any defire to try the experiment, he may read the NOTE on this passage; and I wish it may answer to him.

P A R T V.

OF THE SUPERIORITY OF TRAGIC TO EPIC POETRY.

I.

OBJECTION to TRAGEDY.

IT may be inquired, farther, which of the two imitations, the Epic, or the Tragic, deserves the preference.

If that, which is the least vulgar, or popular, of the two, be the best, and that be such, which is calculated for the better fort of spectators—the imitation, which extends to every circumstance, must, evidently, be the most vulgar, or popular; for there, the imitators have recourse to every kind of motion and gesticulation, as if the audience, without the aid of action, were incapable of understanding them: like bad flute-players, who whirl themselves round, when they would imitate the motion of the Discus, and pull the Coryphæus, when Scylla is the subject. Such is Tragedy. It may also be compared to what the modern actors are in the estimation of their predecessors; for Mynifcus used to call Callipedes, on account of his intemperate action, the ape: and

Though Aristotle instances in gesture only, the objection, no doubt, extended to the whole imitative representation of the theatre, including the stage and scenery, by which place is imitated, and the dresses, which are necessary to complete the imitation of the persons.

² See the NOTES.

Tyndarus was cenfured on the fame account. What these performers are with respect to their predecessors, the Tragic imitation, when entire, is to the Epic. The latter, then, it is urged, addresses itself to hearers of the better fort, to whom the addition of gesture is superfluous: but Tragedy is for the people3; and being, therefore, the most vulgar kind of imitation, is evidently the inferior.

But now, in the first place, this censure falls, not upon the Poet's art, but upon that of the actor; for the gesticulation may be equally laboured in the recitation of an Epic Poem, as it was by Softratus; and in finging, as by Mnasitheus, the Opuntian.

The Objection AN-SWERED.

Again-All gesticulation is not to be condemned; since even all dancing is not; but fuch only, as is unbecoming—fuch as was objected to Callipides, and is now objected to others, whose gestures refemble those of immodest women4.

Farther—Tragedy, as well as the Epic, is capable of producing its effect, even without action; we can judge of it perfectly by reading. If, then, in other respects, Tragedy be superior, it is fufficient that the fault here objected is not effential to it.

Ш.

Tragedy has the advantage in the following respects .- It pos- ADVANTAfesses all that is possessed by the Epic; it might even adopt its GES of Tragedy.

- 3 "It must be allowed, that stage-poetry, of all other, is more particularly levelled to please the populace, and its success more immediately depending upon the common " fuffrage." Pope's Pref. to Shakspeare.
- * As no actresses were admitted on the Greek stage, their capital afters must frequently have appeared in female parts, fuch as, Electra, Iphigenia, Medea, &c. This is fufficiently proved by many paffages of antient authors; and among others, by a remarkable flory of an eminent Greek Tragic actor, told by Aulus Gellius. See the NOTE.
- ⁵ So above, p. 78,—" the power of Tragedy is felt without representation and " actors," metre:

metre³: and to this it makes no inconfiderable addition, in the Music and the Decoration; by the latter of which, the illusion is heightened, and the pleasure, arising from the action, is rendered more fensible and striking.

It has the advantage of greater clearness and distinctness of impression, as well in reading, as in representation.

It has also that, of attaining the end of its imitation in a shorter compass: for the effect is more pleasurable, when produced by a short and close series of impressions, than when weakened by diffusion through a long extent of time; as the Oedipus of Sophocles, for example, would be, if it were drawn out to the length of the Iliad.

Farther: there is less unity in all Epic imitation; as appears from this—that any Epic Poem will furnish matter for feveral Tragedies. For, supposing the Poet to chuse a fable strictly one, the consequence must be, either, that his Poem, if proportionably contracted, will appear curtailed and defective, or, if extended to the usual length, will become weak, and, as it were, diluted. If, on the other hand, we suppose him to employ several fables—that is, a fable composed of several actions?—his imitation is no longer strictly one. The Iliad, for example, and the Odyssey contain many such subordinate parts, each of which has a certain magnitude, and unity, of its own: yet is the construction of those Poems as perfect, and as nearly approaching to the imitation of a single action, as possible.

⁵ See NOTE 36.

⁶ See p. 39, Note 8.

⁷ Compare Part II. Sect. 20, and Note 9.—Aristotle is not here speaking of that unconnected, bistorical multiplicity of action, which he had before condemned, [Part III. Sect. 1.] but of such as was effential to the nature of the Epic Poem. This is plain, from the example, which immediately follows; and, indeed, from the very drift of his argument.

IV.

If then TRAGEDY be superior to the Epic in all these respects, Preferand, also, in the peculiar end at which it aims, (for each species ENCE of ought to afford, not any fort of pleasure indiscriminately, but fuch only as has been pointed out,) it evidently follows, that TRAGEDY, as it attains more effectually the end of the art itself, must deserve the preserence.

TRAGEDY

AND THUS MUCH concerning TRAGIC and EPIC Poetry in Conclusion general, and their several species—the number and the differences of sion. their parts—the causes of their beauties and their defects—the censures of critics, and the principles on which they are to be answered.

⁸ i. e. according to Aristotle's principles, to give "that pleasure which arising " from terror and pity, through imitation." See p. 90.

N O T E S.

NOTE 1.

P. I. ITHYRAMBICS—IMITATION.

If the fenses, in which the term imitation is applied by Aristotle to Poetry, have been rightly determined in the first Differtation, there can be no difficulty with respect to the imitative nature of the Epic and Dramatic species. That of the Dithyrambic is not quite fo obvious, and has accordingly been variously explained. The little, however, that remains of what Aristotle had faid upon this subject, seems sufficient to release any commentator, who is willing to be released, from the trouble of conjectural ingenuity. In Sect. 3. Part I. where the different objects of imitation are confidered, he expressly makes Dithyrambic Poetry imitative of actions, characters, and manners, as well as the Epic and Dramatic; and he, particularly, mentions the Persians and the Cyclops as imitated in the Dithyrambic and Nomic Poetry of Timotheus and Philoxenus'. We may conclude, then, that he regarded this kind of Poetry as imitative because, though the mythological tales, which furnished the subject of these hymns, were.

^{* —} ως ΠΕΡΣΑΣ και ΚΥΚΛΩΠΑΣ Τιμοθε@- και Φιλοξεν@-.

indeed, articles of Pagan faith, and depended not on the Poet's imagination, yet, in the detail of these stories, in describing the actions, and delineating the characters, of the deities themselves, and, still more, of other fabulous and heroic personages occasionally introduced, his fancy and invention must necessarily be, more or lets, employed. This, as we have feen, was, in Aristotle's view, imitation; whether the form of that imitation was partly dramatic and personative, or mere recital in the person of the Poet^b. That the Poetry of these Dithyrambic compositions was chiefly of the latter kind, feems to be implied in the expression of Plato, who, where he explains his division of Poetry into three forts—the purely imitative, or dramatic, the purely narrative, and the mixedrefers, for an example of the purely narrative, to Dithyrambic Poetry. Yet he fays only, that it is to be found chiefly thereέυροις δ' αν αυτην ΜΑΛΙΣΤΑ ΠΟΥ έν Διθυραμβοις. The expression is remarkable, and leaves room for more than a conjecture, that the Dithyrambic was fometimes imitative even in the strict sense of Plato; that is, that the dramatic mixture of the Epic was occasionally admitted. Instances of this occur in the Odes of Pindard; and many of the Odes of Horace are dramatice.

The embarrassiment of the commentators seems to have arisen, principally, from the difficulty they found in conceiving, that section could be admitted into a species of Poetry addressed to the Gods, and sounded on the established Theology of the age. The hymns of Callimachus, and those attributed to Homer, might have been b Diff. I. p. 25. c Rep. lib. iii. p. 394.

⁴ Olymp. I. Aniif. γ, where Pelops speaks. See also Olymp. VI. Epode α, and γ.—Olymp. VIII. Ep. β—And the prophecy of Amphiaraus, in Pyth. VIII. Strophe γ.—The Odes of Pindar, indeed, are not strictly Dithyrambic Poetry; but the chief difference was probably that of their subjects.

^e See Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, vol. ii. 44, &c. where the beauties of those dramatic Odes, and particularly of the fifth Epode, are pointed out and illustrated with much taste.

fufficient to remove this difficulty. These are not, like the Orphic hymns, mere invocations, and indigitamenta, consisting in a short and solemn accumulation of epithets and attributes: they are Epic, narrative hymns; in which the birth, the actions, and even the characters and manners of the deities are described at length, and the sictions of the Poet's imagination are every where engrasted upon the popular creed. The mixture of dramatic imitation, in the Dithyrambic Poetry, is also rendered more probable by the frequent examples of it in these hymns; and especially in those of Homer. From the enthusiastic, wild, audacious character peculiarly attributed to the Bacchie hymns, we have, surely, no reason to suppose in them a degree of scruple and reserve, with respect to all this, which we do not find in other antient religious compositions of a more sober and regular cast.

After what has been faid, the reader will hardly think it neceffary to have recourse to so distant and conjectural an interpretation as that of the Abbé Batteux, who says—" Le Dithyrambe est "imitation, parceque le Poete, en le composant, exprime d'apres le "vraisemblable, les sentimens, les transports, l'ivresse, qui doit "regner dans le Dithyrambes. This ingenious writer seems to have been forced into this solution of the matter by his desire of extending the principle of Poetic imitation beyond the limits, not only of Aristotle's meaning, but of all reasonable analogy. All Lyric Poetry he holds to be essentially imitative; and defining it to be that Poetry, "qui exprime le sentiment," he is reduced to the necessity of making out these sentiments, or seelings, to be, in some sort, imitations; for no other reason, than, that they are assumed and seigned—the temporary produce of that voluntary enthusiasm, which the Poet, by the force of his imagination, excites in him-

f " Audaces Dithyrambos." Hor.

⁸ Ch. i. of his translation; -nete, under the text.

h See his Beaux Arts reduits à un même principe, ch. on Lyric Poetry: and vol. iii. of his Principes de la literature, ch. i. Traité 6.

felf during the moments of composition. But this belongs rather to the style and manner, than to the matter, of Poetry: if imitation at all, it is the imitation, not, properly, of the Poet, but of the man, in order to become the Poet.—The general character of Lyric Poetry is enthusiasm; and enthusiasm, says M. Batteux, " n'est autre chose qu'un sentiment quel qu'il soit-amour, colere, "ioie, admiration, tristesse, &c.-produit par une idee"." But if all illusive feelings of this kind, raised in us by imagination, are imitations, then, not only every artist of genius is an imitator, when he conceives and plans his work, but even every man of fenfibility, whenever he is led, by the voluntary excursions of his fancy, into warm and passionate feelings, that are not prompted by real circumstances.—It is certain, indeed, that not only Dithyrambic and Lyric Poetry, but Epic also, and perhaps every other species worth regarding, has its appropriated ftyle and tone, which every Poet adopts and imitates, when he composes in the kind to which it belongs. But the same may be said of a history, a sermon, and even of a letter: for in these also, though we may not imitate any particular writer, we naturally conform to the general flyle and manner that characterize the particular species of composition. All this however has, manifestly, nothing to do with the imitation that we are confidering.

The Lyric Poet is not always, and effentially, an imitator, any more than the Epic. While he is merely expressing his own fentiments, in his own person, we consider him not as imitating;—we inquire not whether they are the assumed sentiments of the Poetic character, or the real sentiments of the writer himself; we do not even think of any such distinction. He is understood to imitate, in the most general view, no otherwise than by section, by personation, by description, or by sound*; in the view of Aristotle, only by the two sirst of these.

[·] Principes de la Lit. Traité 6. ch. i.

k Ser Differt, I. p. 22.

I will only add, that the Dithyrambic Poetry was, it feems, not originally imitative, but became so by degrees. This sact, and the causes of it, we learn from a curious passage, in the Harmonic Problems of Aristotle, which I shall have occasion to mention in another place.

NOTE 2.

P. 2. FOR AS MEN, SOME THROUGH ART, AND SOME THROUGH HABIT, IMITATE VARIOUS OBJECTS, &c.

I have followed the old and most authentic reading, dia the $\Phi\Omega$ NH Σ : which, though not unexceptionable, has been rejected, The philosopher is, here, I think, without fufficient reason. only illustrating what he had faid of the different means of poetical and mufical imitation, by comparing those arts, in this respect, with other arts more strictly and obviously imitative. he meant to confine his illustration to Painting, was a groundless fancy of Dacier, which led him into two unnecessary corrections of the text, and a very forced and improbable explication of the whole passage. The remark of Aristotle, parenthetically slung in, about art and habit, (δι μεν δια τεχνης, δι δε δια συνηθειας,) was by no means necessary to his illustration. Dacier extends the parenthesis by the reading he adopts, (δι μεν δια τεχνης, δι δε δια συνηθειας, έτεροι δε ΔΙ' ΑΜΦΟΙΝ,) then wonders, why Aristotle, "qui n'ecrit pas un " feul mot inutilement," should enter into such a detail; and then, wantonly alters the text, (from δια τεχνης, to δια ΤΥΧΗΣ,) in order to account for it in a manner, that leaves it more wonderful than he found it. Castelvetro had before proposed a similar alteration — έτεςοι δε ΑΜΦΟΤΕΡΟΙΣ; but in a fense, which, could it be supported, would be far more to the purpose than that of Dacier:

- i. e. "others, again, [imitate] both by colour and by figure." This would answer to what follows,—that the different means of imitation, in the Poetical and Musical arts, were used, sometimes feparately, and sometimes combined. To this sense, however, an objection immediately occurs. We may imitate an object by figure without colour, but not by colour without figure. This difficulty, indeed, Castelvetro endeavours to get rid of, by understanding σχηματα, here, to denote only the folid form of Sculpture, and χωματα, Painting, as chiefly characterized by colour; and, thus, for an example of imitation by both those means, he is forced to have recourse to the coloured Sculpture of the antients. But it would be a waste of discussion to enter fully into the merits of an explanation, that is founded on a reading, by no means, I think, sufficiently warranted, either by the authority of MSS. or by any necessity of alteration.
- ² That the antients fometimes coloured their statues, is well known. From many passages which might be produced as proofs, I shall select one from Plato, which is curious, and would be, alone, decifive. It is in the beginning of his 4th book De Repub.-It had been objected, that, by the severity of his laws relating to his our auss or magistrates, they were reduced to a worse condition, with respect to happiness, than the rest of the citizens. His answer is, that the aim of his legislation was, not to provide for the superior happiness of any one part of his commonwealth, but for the greatest possible happiness of the whole. "Suppose," says Socrates, "we "were painting a flatue; and any one should come, and object to us, as a fault, that "we did not apply the most beautiful colours to the most beautiful parts of the "body—that we had made the eyes, for instance, black, when we should have given them, as being the chief beauty of the human form, a purple colour.—It would," continues Socrates, "be a very reasonable apology, if we should request this critic " not to infift on our making the eyes so beautiful, as to have no longer the appear-"ance of eyes; but to confider, only, whether, by giving to each part its proper "colour, we should not make the whole beautiful. - This is precisely the apology "I make for our legislation: I request the objector, not to infift on our allotting to " the guardians of the flate fuch a happiness, as would render them any thing else " rather than guardians," &c. Plato De Rep. lib. iv. p. 420. C. Ed. Ser. Ωσωερ iv av ei - &c.

That the words $\chi_{\varphi} = \chi_{\varphi} = \chi_{\varphi}$

Farther—by this reading the illustration intended is more perfect, as it comprehends more "means of different kinds"—ΓΕΝΕΙ έτερα. The fame reason favours also the extension of the word σχηματα to Sculpture, at least.

The only objection to the reading, $\delta_{i\alpha}$ $\tau_{i\beta}$ $\phi_{\omega\nu\eta\varsigma}$, is, the improbability that Aristotle should, without any apparent reason, envelop the whole passage in embarrassiment and ambiguity, by such a change of phrase:— Δ IA $\phi_{\omega\nu\eta\varsigma}$;—which every reader is naturally led to join, not with the datives, $\chi_{\varphi\omega\mu\alpha\sigma\iota}$ $\kappa\alpha\iota$ $\sigma_{\chi\eta\mu\alpha\sigma\iota}$, but with Δ IA $\tau_{\xi\chi\eta\varsigma}$, and Δ IA $\sigma_{\upsilon\nu\eta}\theta_{\xi\iota\alpha\varsigma}$: but the word $\phi_{\omega\nu\eta\varsigma}$ opposing such a b See Arift. de Rep. lib. viii. cap. 5. p. 455. С. Plat. de Rep. x. p. 601. A. De Leg. ii. p. 669. A.

[°] $\Sigma_{\rm MMMM}$ is defined by Socrates, in the Meno of Plato, to be, π egas seges—" the boundary of folid form."

d See Diff. I. towards the end, Note 1. Victorius defends the reading on the same ground.

[°] Rhet. lib. iii. cap. 1. § 4.

construction, has therefore, probably, been changed to ἀμφοιν.— This objection has not been solidly answered, I think, either by Victorius, or any other commentator; nor can I think the change of phrase here by any means sufficiently accounted for, merely by assigning, as Victorius does, a passage of Lucian, where the phrase itself, (to which no one objects,) occurs. [See Mr. Winstanley's note.]—I am much inclined, therefore, to admit the reading said by Madius to have been found in an antient MS. and confirming the conjecture of Robortelli,—ἐτεροι δε ΤΗι ΦΩΝΗι. This would clearly mark the bounds of the parenthesis, and fix the construction: και χρωμασι, και σχημασι, πολλα μιμενται τινες—(——) έτεροι δε τη φωνη.

NOTE 3

P. 2. AND OF ANY OTHER INSTRUMENTS CAPABLE OF A SIMILAR EFFECT, AS, THE SYRINX OR PIPE.

The word $\Sigma \nu \rho \nu \xi$ is usually understood to mean the Fistula Panis, constructed of reeds, differing in length, fastened together with wax and thread:— $\kappa \alpha \lambda \alpha \mu \omega \nu$ συνθηκη, $\lambda \nu \nu \omega$ και κης ω συνδεθείσα—as it is described by Jul. Pollux^a. Tibullus has presented in two lines almost as distinct an idea of its form as can be obtained from a drawing.

Fistula cui semper decrescit arundinis ordo, Nam calamus cerà jungitur usque minor.

[Lib. ii. 5. 31.]

But the $\Sigma v_{\varphi} \gamma \xi$ of Aristotle, whatever it was, is here mentioned with the Lyre, and the Flute, as having some, though an inferior,

* Onomast. lib. iv. cap. 9.

degree

degree of the same power and effect:—τοιουται την δυναμιν. This is hardly applicable to so very simple and rude an instrument as the pipe of Pan; a contrivance not beyond the invention of a school-boy. Instruments of nearly the same construction are found, at this day, not only in Turkey, and Arabia, but even in the island of New Amsterdam in the South Seas; and it is a circumstance somewhat curious, that, in France, the instrument of the Arcadian deity, or something very like it, is degraded to the use of travelling tinkers, and known by the name of signer of of it in Mersennus; as he may, also, of the South Sea instrument in the Philosophical Transactions, vol. 65, Part I.—But he will not, probably, be much disposed to believe, that the wild and random sounds of this savage whistle have any thing to do with the schromatic system of the Greeks.

But the passage before us is not the only one, where the Syrinx is mentioned in a way which naturally leads one to suppose, that some instrument less simple and impersect than the sistula Panis must be meant. It is often joined with the cithara and the slute, as an instrument of some importance and effect in concerts and choral accompaniments. In Lucian's treatise Tequ Ogxanteac, it appears, among other curious information upon the subject, that the words of the drama, which the pantomimic dancer was to express by gesture alone, were, at the same time, sung by a chorus, accompanied by various instruments, among which the syrinx is repeatedly mentioned, together with the Ava® or slute. This has, certainly, the appearance of some more powerful instrument than the pastoral syrinx.—Indeed, from the passage of Pollux above referred to, there is reason to conclude, that there b Dr. Burney's Hift. of Music, vol. i. p. 511.

^c Harmonic. p. 73.

d See Spanheim, in Callimachum-Hymn, in Dianam, v. 243.

[°] Ed. Benedicti, p. 942, E .- 938, D, E .- 945, B.

were two inftruments of this denomination; that above described, which he calls the rude, or extemporaneous syrinx, [autoonee] and another, of similar form, but more artificial construction, which he describes as consisting, not of reeds, but of a number of flutes [auron more) arranged in the same manner. The passage is defective; but this seems to me pretty clearly to be the drift of it. By flutes, he must, at least, be supposed to mean pipes of larger size, and of more solid materials, such as those of which slutes were made.

It feems, on the whole, very probable, that the syrinx of Aristotle was either some such improved construction of the flute of Pan, or, as I rather incline to believe, some kind of single pipe, or flageolet. Any single pipe, modulated by the singers, must be regarded as an instrument far superior to any kind of the sistula Panis, that could be played on only by the clumsy expedient of drawing it along the mouth;—" suprà calamos unco percurrere labro," as Lucretius has well described the operation. I cannot indeed say, that I have met with any passage in which the word indeed say, that I have met with any passage in which the word pipe or slute. But such a sense is perfectly analogous to other common applications of the word, and, on the other hand, I know of no clear authority that restrains the meaning of the word, whenever it is singly used, to the sistula Panis. Atheneus speaks

^{*} The passage should, I think, be written as defective, thus: 'n μεν ἐν, (sc. συριγξ,) καλαμων ἐςι συνθηκη λινω και κηρω συνδεθεισα, ἡγε ἀυτοσχεδιω. * * * * * * * * * * ΔΥΛΟΙ πυλλοι, ἐκαστω κ.τ. αλλ.—Salmasius supplied the hiatus thus:—ΑΛΛ Ἡ ΣΠΟΥ-ΔΑΙΟΤΕΡΑ, ἀυλοι πολλοι, &c.—I would not answer for the very words; but that something equivalent is omitted, I have little doubt. See Ed. Hemst. p. 387. Note 43.—where, by the way, Kuhnius commends the emendation, but appears to misunderstand it.

g Lib. v. 1406.

h Vide Lexica: and fee Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 511, where it is rightly observed, that "each of the pipes" which composed the fishula Panis, "was, "properly, a Συριγξ."

of the μονοπαλαμ. Συριγξ invented by Mercury, and opposes it to the πολυπαλαμ. ; and Spanheim, whose authority, in matters of erudition, is as great as the profoundest erudition can give to any man, understands this single-reed syrinx to be meant in the hymn to Mercury attributed to Homer, where it is said of that god, that—

ΣΥΡΙΓΓΩΝ ἐνοῶην ποιησατο ΤΗΛΟΘ' ΑΚΟΥΣΤΗΝ. v. 509.
—a mode of characterizing the tone of the instrument, that reminds one of the "ear-piercing sife" of Shakspeare.

After all, a modern reader may be still surprised to find any degree of imitation, or expression, attributed to so trisling an instrument as a flageolet, or a common flute. But, in reading antient authors, it is frequently necessary, if we would either relish, or even underftand them, properly, to lay afide modern ideas. And if this be necessary in general, it is, perhaps, peculiarly so in the subject of Music. Expression, in our musical language, usually conveys the idea of delicate and refined performance, and is almost appropriated to emotions of the tender and pathetic kind. But, with the antients, imitation, or expression (for the words appear to have been fynonymous¹,) extended to every kind of emotion; to every effect produced, in any confiderable degree, by Music upon the mind. Now very simple instruments, as well as very simple music, are capable of making impressions, and strong impressions, of the joyous kind, without any delicacy or refinement, either in the composition, or the execution. It is not, therefore, strange, that the fyrinx, a shrill and lively pipe, should be ranked by Aristotle as an inftrument of fome expression; especially if, as it seems probable, the fyrinx, of whatever kind, was confidered as a paftoral inftrument, and its expressions were, in consequence, aided by the assosiation of rural and pastoral ideas. The rude syrinx of Pan was unquestionably i P. 184. Lbi fuprà. I See Diff. II.

m "One of the most affecting styles in music is the Pastoral. Some airs," [we may add, and those instruments, also, on which we have been used to hear those airs U 2 performed,] unquestionably of this kind, and appropriated to pastoral use"; and, as far as it can be supposed to have affected by association, might, in the musical language of the Greeks, and by a hearer who felt that effect from it, be considered and spoken of as imitative, without impropriety. But being, as I conceive, of too simple and inconvenient a construction to admit of any expression but what it derived purely from associated ideas, it would not, I think, have been joined by Aristotle with the most expressive and refined instruments of the antients, the cithara, and the flute", and mentioned as of "fimilar power and effect."

NOTE 4

P. 2. FOR THERE ARE DANCERS WHO BY RHYTHM APPLIED TO GESTURE—.

The Greek is— οι των ερχηςων: but there is great reason to suspect the reading. It is generally rendered, "Some dancers:" but Victorius, who understands it in that sense, says—durus tamen sermo; and produces no authority for such a phrase. Heinsius performed,] "put us in mind of the country, of rural fights and rural founds, and "dispose the heart to that chearful tranquillity, that pleasing melancholy, that "vernal" delight," which groves and streams, flocks and herds, hills and vallies, inspire." Dr. Beattie—Essay on Poetry and Music, p. 142.

- ⁿ Plato, Rep. iii. p. 399. Serran.
- · ° Aristotle, in the 8th book De Republicâ, cap. vi. where he is considering what instruments should be used in the musical education of children, excludes the cithara, as too complicated and difficult for any but professors. He calls it τεχνικον ὀργανον, and ranks it with the ἀνλ Φ or flute. Plato, however, admits the use of the cithara in his republic, as a more simple instrument than the flute, which he forbids. [Rep. iii. abi suprâ.] For some idea of the delicacy and refinement of execution, and force of expression, expected from the accomplished Λυλητης, I refer the reader to the Harmonides of Lucian, and to a passage in Philostratus, Ed. Morel. p. 228.

proposed— δι ΠΟΛΛΟΙ των δρχηςων. The learned reader may, perhaps, agree with me, that-ENIOI TON OPXNEON, would be preferable, as nearer to the text. It is not probable, that the degree of imitative skill here described was possessed by all dancers, or even by "the greater part" of them. A passage from Aristocles is preferved by Athenaus, in which Teleftes, a dancer employed by Æschylus, is mentioned as remarkable for this talent:—ΟΥΤΩΣ ΗΝ ΤΕΧΝΙΤΗΣ, ώςε, εν τω όρχεισθαι τες Εωτα έωι Θηβας, φανερα ποιασθαι τα πραγματα δί δρχησεως. [Athen. p. 22.] This dancing appears plainly to have been of that kind, which was afterwards pushed to fuch an excels of cultivation by the pantomimic dancers in the age of Augustusa; and which is well known to have divided all Rome into parties, and even, frequently, to have made the theatre a fcene of bloodshed. Of this fact, I cannot help adding, that a proof fomewhat curious is furnished by Valerius Maximus; who, in the arrangement of his miscellaneous work, places his chapter De Spectaculis, immediately after that, De militaribus institutis; and gives this reason: "Proximus militaribus institutis, ad urbana capra, id est, Theatra, gradus faciendus est: quoniam hæc quoque, sapenumero, animosas acies instruxerunt; excogitataque cultûs Deorum, et hominum delectationis, causâ, non fine aliquo pacis rubore, voluptatem et religionem CIVILI SANGUINE, scenicorum portentorum gratia, macularunt." [Lib. ii. 4.]—These scenica por*fenta* were the Pantomimes.

Aristotle says here, δια των σχηματιζομενων ξυθμων. It seems, at first view, that the inverse of this expression would have been more accurate—δια των ρυθμιζομενων σχηματων—by rhythmic gestures. And, if he had been here considering the imitation of Dance, separately, and in itself, he probably would have expressed himfels in that way. But dancing is here transiently mentioned,

 $^{^{-2}}$ — πατα τον ΣΕΒΑΣΤΟΝ μαλιςα αι μεν γας πεωται έκειναι [sc. δεχνσεις] ώσωες τινες είζαι και θεμελιοι της Όςχησεως ησαν.— Lucian. de Salt. p. 927. Ed. Bened.

b See Tacit. and Sucton. passim.

merely to exemplify what he had been faying, of the combined, or feparate, use of rhythm, words, and melody; and to shew, in what manner, not only melody and rhythm might be separated from words, as in music; but rhythm, also, might be separated from melody, and used alone. Any mode of expression, therefore, which would have represented gestures $(\sigma_{\chi\eta\mu\alpha\tau\alpha})$ as the principal means of the imitation, would not have suited his purpose. It would, also, as Victorius and others have observed, have tended to consound the means of imitation in the poetic and musical arts, which he is here considering, with those means of a different kind, which he had just enumerated, as employed in arts of more obvious and strict imitation, and among which Σ XHMATA were mentioned.

It has been also objected, that Aristotle is, here, prosededly instancing in taus EIPHMENAIS texpais—in the arts "above-men-"tioned"—and yet introduces Dancing, which had not been mentioned: a difficulty easily overcome, if we consider, that Dancing was among the musical arts; closely connected with Poetry, and, above all, with Tragedy.

NOTE 5

P. 3. THE EPOPOEIA IMITATES BY WORDS ALONE, OR BY VERSE, &c.

In my translation of this perplexing passage, as far as the words—ποιοιτο την μιμησιν—inclusively, I have given that sense which is now generally adopted, and in which almost all the commentators are agreed. And it has certainly this advantage, that it feems to be the only confishent and intelligible version that can be given of the whole passage, as it now stands. But it appears to me, after the closest attention I have been able to give it, that, in the present condition of the text, no man can reasonably be consident of conveying the true meaning of Aristotle in any translation or explanation that he can give.

^c For such an instance, he could have recourse only to Dance; and so Arist. Quintil.

—ρυθμω δε ΚΑΘ' ΑΥΤΟΝ μεν [νοειται] έπι ΨΙΛΗΣ ΟΡΧΗΣΕΩΣ. The whole passage, where he is considering melody, rhythm, and words, in their separate use, and in their various combinations, is curious, and may serve to illustrate this part of Aristotle's treatise.—See p. 31, 32. Ed. Meib.

The passage sets out with an expression most unfortunately ambiguous, and demonstrated to be so, by the very considence with which the ambiguity has been denied, by critics and commentators of great learning and fagacity, in favour of interpretations directly opposite to each other. Some, by the expression, horois his have understood Aristotle to mean prose, and others, verse, without music. -But this is far from being all the difficulty with which a tranflator has to struggle in this passage. In the words—if in the words ΧΡΩΜΕΝΗ των μετρων τυγχανεσα ΜΕΧΡΙ ΤΟΥ NYN-there is, furely, fomething defective. All render this,-" or, making use " of some one kind of metre, AS I'T HAS DONE to this day"." And this, indeed, feems the only fense that can be given to the words as they stand. But it appears to me, that the original cannot, by any fair and warranted elliptical construction, be made to fay this. Heinfius alone gives the fair and literal version; "vel uno tantum "genere utatur usque ad tempus nostrum"—in plain English— " whether mixing different metres together, or using some one " kind of metre to this day"." I am perfectly aware of the elliptical genius of the Greek language in general, and of Aristotle's

Madius, Beni, Piccolomini, Heinfius, Dacier, Batteux.

[&]quot; 'Aut uno aliquo metrorum genere usa sit, quod à priscis temporibus ad nostrum usque factitatum est." Goulston.—" Ou qu'elle se consente d'une seule espece, comme elle l'a fait jusq' à present." Dacier.—And so Piccolomini, "Per quello che sit vede sare sino ai tempi d'oggi."

[&]quot;It is fo rendered, I find, by the English translator of 1775; "either inter"mixing the various metres, or, using one particular fort to this very day."

flyle, in particular; yet to my ears, I confess, this English, non-sensical as it is, does not found more strange than the Greek from which it is taken. Some word, or words, must, I should suppose, have been omitted between τυγχανεσα, and, μεχει.

Again: - εδεν γαρ αν έχοιμεν ΟΝΟΜΑΣΑΙ ΚΟΙΝΟΝ τες Σωφρον αι Ξεναρχε μιμες, &c:—I submit it to those who are versed in the Greek language, whether it feems probable, that, if Aristotle had meant to express the fense usually given to the words, (i. e. "for "we should otherwise have no common name to give to," &c.) he would have expressed it in that Greek? I can only say that I know of no fimilar example. But farther: the words are conditional εδεν γαρ AN εχοιμεν—and yet the condition is by no means clearly pointed out. The fenfe may be, and has been, variously supplied. It feems not improbable, that there is some omission between the words, vuv, and edev.—I am not able entirely to repel a suspicion for I give it as nothing more—that the words, pexel to vov, may belong to this fentence, and the whole may originally have stood thus: -- είτε μιγνυσα μετ' άλληλων, είθ' ένι τινι γενα χρωμενη των μετρών τυγχανεσα. Μεχρι ΓΑΡ τε νυν εδεν ΕΧΟΜΕΝ, &c. i. e. "For we " have hitherto no common appellation," &c .- So much, as to the condition of the text in this passage.

The interpretation, which I have followed, has been very ably defended by feveral of the commentators, whose arguments I need not repeat; by none, I think, so powerfully as by Paolo Benis but it requires considerable patience to follow him through the controversial zigzag of his captious and fatiguing logic.

The strongest support furnished by Aristotle himself to this extention of the term Epopaia to all imitation, siction, invention, &c. by words only, without music, whether in verse or prose, is, I think, to be found in Sect. 6, Part I. [Original, cap. ix.] For, if a hiftory put into verse would, as he there asserts, be still a fort of history, we may infer, that an Epic Poem reduced to prose would, in bis idea, have been still a fort, at least, of Poem.—What he says in the conclusion of that fection—that the Poet should be the says in the conclusion of this sable, than of his verse, has the same aspect.—The same idea is also savoured by the extent which he has actually given to the term Epopwia, in Sect. 3, Part I. [Original, cap. ii.] where it is expressly applied, not only to the serious Poetry of Homer, but to Poems of a comic, and even burlesque, character. An Epic Poem without elevation is, nearly, as repugnant to modern ideas as a Poem without verse. It would not appear much more strange to give the title of Epic Poem to Tom Jones, than to Hudibras; to apply it to the Telemaque, would, undoubtedly, appear much less stranges.

⁴ I have only transposed vag, and omitted an, for which omission there is MS. authority.

[·] Comment. in Ariflotelis Poeticam, Partic. 6.

It may be worth remarking, farther, that there is one circumfance, which, I think, would evidently tend to render this doctrine of Aristotle—if it was his doctrine—less extraordinary to the antients, than it appears to us; and that is, that the difference between metre, and well-measured prose, though, no doubt, sufficient to make them readily distinguished by the ear, seems to have been less than it is with us. To what a degree of refinement they carried their rules for the application of the various poetical feet to their prose compositions, and with what sastidious delicacy of ear they discriminated one combination of syllables from another, is well known from the writings of Cicero, Quintilian, Dion. Halicarnassensis, &c.—It would be thought a strange expression, were a modern writer to say, comparing the Orator and f Itaque video visum esse nonnullis, Platonis & Democriti locutionem, etsi absit à versu, tamen, quòd incitatiùs seratur, et clarissimis verborum luminibus utatur, potius Poema putandum quam comicorum Poetarum, apud quos, nist quad versiculi sunt, nihil est aliud quotidiani dissimile sermonis. Cir. Orat. cap. xx.

the Poet, that the latter was "rather more confined by numbers:" "numeris additiction paulo"."

But, after all, the chief point of difficulty appears to me to lie, not in Aristotle's afferting, that Poetry, in bis idea of the word, might subsist without verse, but in his giving the name of Epopwia to such compositions as the Mimes of Sophron, and the Dialogues of Plato. But of this, in the next note.

In my translation of the words, Loyous Likous, I have ventured to depart from the common interpretation; but without any material change in the fense. They are generally understood to mean prose; and Dacier afferts positively, that, "those two words are never "joined by Aristotle or Plato in any other sense"." If he meant, that, wherever hings is joined to hope, it is always used to exclude metre only, he is certainly mistaken. He had, himself, but just before, quoted a passage of Plato, in which the expression, λογει ψιλοι, appears clearly to mean, words without melody. It is in his fecond book De Legibus, where, complaining, in his usual strain, of the separation of Poetry and Music, he says of the Poets, that they employ ρυθμον μεν και ρηματα Μελες χωρις, ΛΟΓΟΥΣ ΨΙΛΟΥΣ ΕΙΣ ΜΕΤΡΑ ΤΙΘΕΝΤΕΣ: μελος δ'αυ και ρυθμες ανευ ρηματων, ψιλη κιθαρίσει τε και αυλησει προσχρωμενοι k . The words, λογες ψίλες είς μετρα τιθεντες, Dacier translates, very strangely, " mettant de la " simple prose en vers." But what has turning prose into verse to z Cic. de Orat. i. 16.—So, again, Or. ad Brutum, cap. lxvi. speaking of prose compared with verse, he says, "at liberior aliquantò oratio."—To the same purpose ibid. cap. xx. Nam etiam Poetæ quæstionem attulerunt, quidnam esset illud quo ipsi differrent ab oratoribus. Numero maximè videbantur antea, et versu; nunc apud oratores jam ipse numerus increbuit.

h Ch. i. Note 22.

¹ I have ventured to alter the word σχηματα to ἐηματα; a correction, which, I think, the learned reader will fee to be obviously necessary, from the purport and expression of the whole passage. The opposition is clear—ἐνθμον μεν και ΡΗΜΑΤΑ μελες χωρις——μελΦ δ ΑΥ και ἐνθμες ἀνεν ΡΗΜΑΤΩΝ.

^k Ed. Serr. vol. ii. p. 669.

do with Plato's complaint?—ψιλοι, here, applied to λογοι, answers evidently to medes xwois, and excludes melody; just as, in thin kibaρισει και αυλησει, the same adjective answers to ανευ έηματων, and excludes words1. And this appears to me to be the obvious sense of ψιλοις in the passage of Aristotle before us. By λογοις ψιλοις. I understand—not, words without metre, i. e. Prose—but, words without mulic. It is, furely, most natural, and most to Aristotle's purpose, to apply the privative force of this, bere, to the two means of imitation, melody and rhythm; which are excluded in the Epopæia, as words are, in the preceding instance of the flute and the lyre, and both words and music, in that of dance. And thus he bas actually used the word, in the compound ψιλομετρια, in the next chapter. The only difference is, that there he has joined the word $\psi_{\alpha} \otimes \to metre; here, to words in general. But in both places, the meaning is probably the same—i. e. " without " melody and rhythm."

The word λογω is, plainly, used by Aristotle, in his first enumeration of the means of imitation, [—èν Ρυθμω και Λογω και Αρμονια. cap. i.] in the general sense, of language, discourse, or words, whether with, or without metre; as we say, "the words of a fong," &c. as opposed to the music a; and that, whether those words are verse, as in general they are, or prose, as in the songs of the Messiah, and in the anthems of our church. And, that the word λογω was purposely used by Aristotle in this latitude, is rendered highly probable by his varying the expression, where he

I find this very passage mentioned by Casaubon, De Satiricá, &c. p. 346, with the same explanation of λογες ψιλες.—This is not the only instance in Plato that contradicts the affertion of Dacier. In a passage of his Symposium, cited by Victorius, [Ed. Serr. p. 215.] the words—ἀνευ ὀργανων, ψιλοις λογοις—are, I think, rightly rendered by Serranus, "Sine ullis instrumentis, assage same supposed in the same m So Virgil: "——numeros memini, fi VERBA tenerem." Let. ix.

Nothing is more common than this use of λογ⊕ in Aristotle and Plato. Thus the latter, De Rep. lib. iii. — το μελ⊕ ἐκ τριων ἐςι συγκειμενον, ΛΟΓΟΥ τε και ἀρμοτιας και ἐρυθμε—which agrees exactly with Aristotle's account of the means of imitation.

speaks of Tragedy, Comedy, Dithyrambics, and Nomes, to which metre was effential, and fubflituting there, the word Μετρω, for $\Lambda_0 \gamma \omega^n$. It was natural, then, that he should say, when he came to speak of the Epic imitation, as distinguished from those he had before mentioned, that it imitates by words alone—i. e. without melody and rhythm, or, as we should say, without music. adds—n Metrous—" or verse." And why?—Probably, because he thought his expression would be neither clear, nor exact, without it: not clear, because the most nfual meaning of λογοι ψιλοι being profe, it might have been fo taken here, and he might have appeared to fey, at least, though no one could reasonably suppose he meant it, that the Epic imitates by profe only—μονον τοις λόγοις ψιλοις: -not exact, because, metre being, as he himself expressly says, a species, or part, of rhythm, words, put into metre, were not, strictly speaking, ψιλοι, that is, χωρις Αρμονίας και ΡΥΘΜΟΥ. this is exactly conformable to the expression of Plato in the passage above quoted, where he confiders verse, even unaccompanied by music, as still consisting of rhythm and words, [PYOMON MEN NOW ίηματα Μελες χωρις; —plainly regarding metre as a species, or form, of rhythm.

I understand, therefore, the meaning of Aristotle, in this expression—τοις λογοις ψιλοις, η τοις μετροις, to amount to this;—" by "words, without the other means of melody and rhythm, or at "most, with so much of rhythm only, as is implied in the idea of metre: "without rhythm, in its musical sense of strict time"." This sense of the words agrees persectly with what follows—2δεν γαρ αν εχοιμεν, &c. i. e. "For otherwise—if we do not allow the Epopæia to "imitate by words, in the general sense, whether prose or verse—"we shall have no common name for Epic imitations in prose; and, if we do not allow it to imitate in either one or more species ἐυθμφ, και μελεί, και ΜΕΤΡΩΙ. Cap. i.

τα γας μετρα, ότι ΜΟΡΙΑ των ρυθμων έτι, φανεςον. Cap. iv.
 See the quotation from Mr. Harris, p. 70.

of metre, we shall have no common name for the same kind of imitation in Elegiac, or other verse."

The great advantage of this sense of lovois fulloss is, that, while it leaves in full force that explanation of the whole passage, which I have followed, it removes, at the fame time, or at least confiderably weakens, what has always struck me as one of the strongest objections to it. Nothing appears to me more improbable, than, that Aristotle, advancing a doctrine so new, and so repugnant to the prevailing ideas of his own times, as, that a species of Poetry might subfift without verse, should chuse to present this novelty in the most offensive way, by beginning at once, and without any management, with the mention of profe: that he should fay-"The Epic Poem imitates by profe alone, or, by verse." If by λογοις ψιλοις he had meant profe, as Dacier and others contend. would he not naturally—one might fay, unavoidably—have referved those words for the last in the period? Would not the order, in short, have been this?—" by verse alone; and that either " of a fingle kind, or mixed—or even by profe." As I have rendered the words, prose is not mentioned at all, but implied only in the general expression of, words; as it is, equally, in his first enumeration of the means of imitation—εν ρυθμω και ΛΟΓΩΙ και άρμο-At the worst, the idea of prose is not, as in the other version, presented before that of verse.

With respect to what I have said of the novelty of the philosopher's doctrine, and its remoteness from the common ideas of the antients concerning the importance of metre to Poetry, I may refer even to his own way of speaking, in general, upon that subject. In his Rhetoric, for example, he says—ρυθμον δει έχειν τον λογον, Μετρον δε, μη ΠΟΙΗΜΑ ΓΑΡ ΕΣΤΑΙ.—" In prose-composition there should be rhythm, but not metre—for then it will be TOEM⁴." The reader may also be not displeased to see what ² Rhet. lib. iii. cap. viii. p. 591. Ed. Duval.

If have given in NOTE 229, respecting the privileges and advantages of Poetry.—Plato goes so far, as to compare Poetry, when reduced to prose, to a face, which, having no solid beauty of form and symmetry, has lost its only charm, when the bloom of youth, and delicacy of complexion, have deserted it. But the zeal of Plato for depreciating Poetry is well known. He would, probably, have approved the indignation of one of the Fathers, who called it "the Devil's wine." It must be confessed, however, that he has poured a great deal of this wine into his own writings; and were they to be reduced to plain prose, and stripped of that and of the bloom and colouring of poetic diction, and poetic fancy, by which they are so distinguished, I should be in some pain for the appearance they would make.

But, to return:—After all that is to be faid in favour of that interpretation, which, on the whole, I have thought it best to follow, I must end this note, as I began it, by declaring my conviction of the impersect condition of the original, and confessing my doubt, whether the true meaning of Aristotle, in this passage, has yet been, or ever will be, discovered.

[—] ἐοιπε [tc. τα των Ποιντων, γυμνωθεντα γε των της μεσιμής ΧΡΩΜΑΤΩΝ, ἀυτα ἐφ ἀυτων λεγομενα,] τοις των 'ΩΡΑΙΩΝ περοσωποις, ΚΑΛΩΝ ΔΕ ΜΗ, ὁια γινεται ίδειν, ὁταν ὰυτα το ΑΝΘΟΣ περολιπη.—Rep. x. p. 601. Ed. Serrani.—This is quoted by Aristotle, Rhet. iii, cap. iv. p. 588. Duval.—In Dr. Beattie's Essay on Poetry, &c. Part II. ch. ii. it is, by mistake, attributed to Demosthenes. Nor is the meaning of the passage there fully given. Plato does not content himself with saying, that "versisie" cation is to Poetry, what bloom is to the human countenance." He says, that resission is to Poetry, what bloom is to a sace, that has no beauty but bloom.

N O T E 6.

P. 3. THE MIMES OF SOPHRON AND XENARCHUS, AND THE SOCRATIC DIALOGUES.

HAD Aristotle proposed only to extend the term Enomolia to all imitations of the NARRATIVE kind, whether in verfe or prof, whether serious or comic, this, to a reader who should enter thoroughly into bis ideas of Poetry, would not, perhaps, appear extraordinary. It would be only claffing the different forms of Poetry, as one might expect him to class them, according to what he himfelf conceived to be the chief and most characteristic difference of their imitations. But here, we find the name applied to competition. of a character strikingly different—to Mimes, and Dialogues; for it is indeed, as Dacier fays, a very obvious question, and one which cannot but have occurred to every reader-" les Dialogues ne re-" femblent-ils pas plutot au Poeme Dramatique, qu' au Poeme "Epique?"—An embarraffing question, and which, being at all events to be answered, he answers immediately, and roundly— "Non, fans doute." And why?—Because, says he, "the drama "imitates by words and music, the Epic Poem, by words only." But, to apply the expression of the philosopher to this critic πλεξας ευ, λυα κακως. This is much the fame thing as if one should deny, that two men, of form and features strikingly fimilar, resembled each other, merely because their coats were of different colours; or, to come still nearer to the case, if one should affert that one of these men bore a greater resemblance to a third, with whom he chanced to agree in the fingle circumstance of not wearing a wig. Is it probable, that Aristotle, in classing and denominating a principal species of Poetry, should be guided by such a circumstance as the mere absence of music? when even metre he regards as not effential, and speaks of it as one of the ηδυσματα of Poetic language^b. He allows, indeed, that music is the most pleasurable of the ήδυσματα, or seasonings, of Tragedy; but, that he regarded it as less effential than metre, is evident from the place which he affigns it in his arrangement of the fix parts of Tragedy. according to the order of their importance; for he there places it next before the Our, or Decoration, which he pronounces to be, of all the parts, " the most foreign to the Poet's art:" huse cineicy the mointing d.—On the other hand, the circumstance of Narration in the person of the Poet he every where seems to make an effential mark of distinction between the Epic and the. Dramatic Poeme: fo that, in order to avoid making him absolutely inconfistent with himself, we must be obliged to suppose, with the commentators, that he uses the word Εποποίια in two fenses; here, in its general and etymological sense, that of imitating, or making, by words, and every where else in the common and limited fense of narrative imitation⁸. The first of these must be considered as a mere proposal: we must understand Aristotle to say no more than this-that some common term, to include all compositions imitating by words only, was wanted, and that the term, Epopæia, was best adapted to that purpose. In the rest of his treatise he conforms to the established ideas and language.—This, however, is by no means fatisfactory.

 $[\]nu = \lambda \epsilon \gamma \omega$ δε ΉΔΥΣΜΕΝΟΝ λογον, τον έχοντα φυθμον και άρμονιαν και ΜΕΤΡΟΝ.. - Cap. vi.

⁻ μεγισον των ήδυσματων. Ibid..

a Ilid.

See Cap. v.—Cap. xxiii. initio. So Cap. xxiv. εν δε τη Εποποίια, δια το ΔΙΗ--ΓΗΣΙΝ έιναι, &c.—and ibid. ή διηγηματική μιμήσις, is equivalent to η Εποποιητική μιμήσις. In Cap. xxvi.

See the note of Heinfius.

As in the passages just referred to, Note ...

It still remains, I confess, no inconsiderable difficulty with me, to conceive, that Aristotle should, by applying the term Exordia to all imitative writing, whether of a narrative or dramatic form, without music, give it an extension inconsistent, as it seems, with his own principles, and confounding those distinctions, which, in his own view, were the most essential. If he had meant so to apply the term in the passage before us, he would, surely, have been more explicit, and, where, after this passage, he first mentioned the Epopwia in the usual sense, would have added some words of limitation and distinction to prevent consustant. But this he has not done. Though evidently speaking of the heroic and narrative Epic, he calls it only, $\hat{\eta} \in \pi \circ \pi \circ u = 0$; as if no other application of the word had been mentioned.

Of the Mimes of Sophron we can acquire but a very imperfect idea, either from what is faid of them in antient authors, or from the fragments that are preferved in Atheneus, Demetrius, and others. It has even been long disputed among the learned, whether they were profe or verfe; and, at last, it seems to be settled, that they were neither; a kind of compromise comfortable enough to the disputants on both sides; for if the fragments are something between verse and prose, they, who affert them to be either, are fomething between right and wrong. I shall not enter into this discussion; but refer the reader to the remarks of the learned Valckenaer on the argument of the Adaria (20001 of Theocritus; where he will find fome curious and uncommon information upon this fubject. That these compositions, however, were either a species of the drama, or, at least, dialogues in the dramatic form, there feems to be no doubt'. Dacier, indeed, afferts, that they were, like the Epic Poem, "une imitation composée de narration h Theocriti Decem Eidyllia, Lug. Eat. 1773. See, particularly, p. 200.

¹ See Cafaubon, de Sat. Poef. cap. iii. p. 115, 116, and the passage of Plutarch to which he refers, Sympof. Prol. lib. vii. Prob. viii. p. 1268. Ed. H. St. And, in his treatise Ποτεςα των ζωαν, μ. τ. 32. p. 1792.

"et d'action." But he produces no proof of this, nor do I know of any. - I must farther observe, that, supposing what is related, of the fondness of Plato for the Mimes of Sophron, and of their having been his model in the mingris προτωπων of his own dialogues , to be true, it may reasonably be inferred, that we ought by no means to confound them with the Roman Mimes, or to apply to them, as is too often done, all that is faid of the latter by Diomedes, and other writers of that age. Such licentious and obscene trash would not, furely, have been found under the pillow of the moral and reforming Plato; and that, ολοφ ἐπι γηρω είδω, and, as fome affert, even in the hour of death. In faying this, however, I do not forget, that delicacy is not to be fought for even in the ftrictest morality of antient times. For the best idea that can now be formed of the manner of this famous mimographer, we must have recourse, I believe, to the fifteenth Idyl of Theocritus", which, as we are informed in the MS. argument found by Ruhnkenius in the royal library at Paris, is an imitation of a Mime of Sophron upon a fimilar fubject.". A more exact piece of natural delineation cannot be imagined. It is not, indeed, la belle nature; it is the nature of common and fimple, or, as some affect to call it, of low, life; but copied with fo close and faithful a pencil, that, to every reader accustomed, in any degree, to observe the manners of mankind in general, and whose taste is not perverted by affectation, or fettered by rule, the truth and reality of the imitation will, I believe, amply compensate for the want of dignity in the thing imi-To those who receive no pleasure from this source, I would rather

^{*} See Valckenaer's Theoc. p. 194.

¹ Sophron, mimorum quidem feriptor, sed quem Plato edeo probavit, ut suppositos capiti libros ejus, cum moreretur, habuisse tradatur. Quintil. i. 10.

m The Συςακισται, η Αδωνιαζωσαι. The Syracufian women, or, the women at the feftival of Adonis.

η Παρεπλάσε Dε ποιτματίου έκ των παζα Σωφρονι θεωμένων τα Ισθμία. Valcken. Decem Eid. Theor. p. 188.

rather recommend the belle nature of Pope's Pastorals, or the still finer nature of Fontenelle's.—I would only observe farther, that this imitation of Sophron is in the strict dramatic form; and that it contains nothing in the least degree indecent, or disgusting.

Of the AOPOI EQEPATIKOI, by which, undoubtedly, Aristotle meant chiefly, if not folely, the Dialogues of Plato, I shall only observe, that they have all, in a high degree, the dramatic and imitative spirit, and that by far the greater part of them are in the unmixed dramatic form, so as to admit of representation; and it, accordingly, appears from Plutarch, that those of the lighter cast among them were sometimes performed by boys, as an entertainment, at the Symposia of the Romans in his time.

N O T E 7.

P. 3. Connecting the Poetry, or Making, with the metre.

[—] Συναπτοντες τω μετρω το ποιευ.—Not, "on applique au vers "feul l'idée qu'on a de la Poe/ie," as M. Batteux renders it, but, as it is translated by Piccolomini, with his usual exactness—" con-"giugnendo il verbo, Ποιευ, [Poicin, cio é fare,] con la qualità del "metro."—I understand Aristotle's expression to mean, not the connection of the general idea of Poetry with that of Verse, though this indeed be implied; but, the junction of the word, Ποιευ, with the name of some particular metre, in the compound words, Ελεγγειοποιοι, Εποποιοι, and the like.

[•] We have, I think, thirty-two dialogues of Plato, taking those De Republicá, and De Legibus, which are now divided into books, as each one dialogue. Or these thirty-two, only fix are in the narrative form.

P Plutarchi Sympof. Prob. lib. vii. Prob. viii.

NOTE 8.

P.4. TREATISES OF MEDICINE OR NATURAL PHILOSOPHY IN VERSE.

Two Poems of Empedocles—that concerning Nature, and his Expiations—contained together, according to Diog. Laertius, five thousand hexameters, and another, on the subject of Medicine, six hundred.—τα μεν εν περι ΦΥΣΕΩΣ ἀυτω και δι Καθαρμοι, εις επη τεινεσι πεντακισχιλια, δ δε ΙΑΤΡΙΚΟΣ λογω, εις επη εξακιστια [End of the Life of Empedocles.] This, by the way, confirms the emendation of Heinsius—φυσικον, for μεσικον. Nothing, I believe, is known of any antient Poem on the subject of Music.

The earliest philosophy was natural philosophy, and the earliest vehicle of that philosophy was verse. Orpheus, Hesiod, Parmenides, Xenophanes, Empedocles, and Thales, are all mentioned by Plutarch as poet-philosophers of this kind. Pythagoras is said to have written a Poem On the Universe, in hexameters. This measure was, at least, suited to the dignity of philosophical speculation. We cannot say so much of the verse chosen by Epicharmus for the vehicle of a treatise Concerning sensible and intellectual objects—Περι των αισθητων και νοητων—part of which is quoted by Diog. Laertius in his life of Plato. It was written in the Trochaic tetrameter, a very unphilosophical measure, if rightly characterized by Aristotle, who gives it the epithets of τροχερον—ορκηΣπου—ΚΟΡΔΑΚΙΚΩΤΕΡΟΝ. An English reader would be surprised, ^{*} Περι τυ 'Ολλ, ἐν ἐπετι. Diog. Lacrt. VIII. 7.—And fee Plut. Περι τε μη χραν ἐμμετρα, &c. p. 716. H. Steph.

ь III. 10.

^{*} Rhet. iii. 44. Poet. cap. xxiv. The word, πορδαπικατερον, cannot be adequately translated. "A figgib measure," would be weak, to the force of the original. The Koglas is known to have been a kind of dance, so full of bustoonery and indecency, prised, on opening a didactic and philosophical Poem, to find it written in the measure of—" Jolly mortals, fill your glasses," &c.

NOTE 9.

P. 4. HOMER AND EMPEDOCLES HAVE NOTHING IN COMMON BUT THEIR METRE.

In his book De Poetis, Aristotle spoke somewhat differently. He there said, as cited by Diog. Laertius, "that Empedocles "resembled Homer in the beauty of his diction; abounding in "metaphors, and making a happy use of the other embellishments "of Poetic language"." It does not seem easy to make this perfectly consistent with what he bere afferts—that Empedocles had nothing in common with Homer but his metre. He meant, I suppose, no more, than that Empedocles had nothing of the true Poetic character of Homer, his invention, imitation, &c. But he certainly has faid more.

N O T E 10.

P. 4. So, Also, THOUGH ANY ONE SHOULD CHUSE TO CONVEY HIS IMITATION IN EVERY KIND OF METRE, &c.

The conjecture of Heinfius, who contended, that—in non και ποιητην προσαγορευτεον—should be read interrogatively, I have re-that Theophrasius makes it one of the marks of his Profligate Man, that "he will "even dance the Κοςδαξ, sober, and without a mask."—Theophrasii Charaet. cap. vi. Πεςι Απονείας.

2 - εν δε τω Περι Ποιητών φησιν [Αρισστελης] ότι και ΌΜΗΡΙΚΟΣ δ Εμπεδεπλης, και δευθεσερι την ΦΡΑΣΙΝ γεγοιε, μεταφορικΘ τε ών, και τοις άλλοις τοις περι ποιητικην έπιτευγμασι χρωμενΘ. Diog. Lacrt. lib. viii. 57.

jected,

jected, because the sense it gives the passage appears to me to be trisling. It makes Aristotle say—" If Poets are to be denominated "from their metre, what name is to be given to him, who writes "a Poem in all forts of metre? You cannot call him an Exoxoco, "an Iam Genoco, &c. Is he, therefore, not to be called a Poet at all, "because you cannot call him the Poet, or Maker, of this or that "particular metre?"—But the answer to this would surely be obvious: "We cannot, it is true, call him any one of these, "exclusively; we call him all these; he is the Poet of every metre, in which he composes; and, in our ideas, the more a Poet, "in proportion to the number of the different measures, of which he shews himself a master."—I must also remark, that, in this way of understanding the passage, the word, opones, is not accounted for, nor fairly rendered, I think, either in the version of Heinsius, or in any of those that follow him.

I have, also, rejected the reading of Victorius—'ΟΥ ποιοιτο την μιωτσω; because it appears to me, that the phrase will not admit of the fense, in which it is rendered, of not imitating at all.—It is obferved by Victorius himself, that the phrase, ποιεισθαι την μιμησιν, is never used by Aristotle as equivalent to μιμεσθαι only, but always where he is speaking of the means, or manner, by, or in, which, the imitation is made. Thus, ch. i.—ΠΟΙΟΥΝΤΑΙ την μιμησ:ν ΕΝ ΡΥΘΜΩΙ και ΛΟΓΩΙ και ΑΡΜΟΝΙΑΙ.—Again—ΔΙΑ ΤΡΙΜΕΤΡΩΝ n. τ. αλ. ΠΟΙΟΙΤΟ την μιμησα. And, at the end, EN ΟΙΣ ΠΟΙΟΥΝΤΑΙ την μιμησιν—" the different means, by which they form or execute their imitation."—Thus, too, ch. xxiv.—is yap 715 EN ALAOI TINI METPOI δηγηματικήν μ.μησιν ΠΟΙΟΙΤΟ.—ch. vi. EN ΤΟΥΤΟΙΣ [fc. μελοποίια και λεζει] ΠΟΙΟΥΝΤΑΙ την μιμησιν. ibid. with a participle—ΠΡΑΤΤΟΝΤΕΣ ΠΟΙΟΥΝΤΑΙ την μιμησιν as in the passage before us, άπωτα τα μετρα ΜΙΓΝΥΩΝ ΠΟΙ-OFFO THE purpose. - The construction and the sense are the same, when the same mode of expression is applied to other subjects; as, cep. iv. - τας μαθέσεις ΠΟΙΕΙΤΑΙ ΔΙΑ ΜΙΜΗΣΕΩΣ-And, Rhet. lit.

lib. i. cap. i feet. 3. ΔΙΑ ΤΩΝ ΚΟΙΝΩΝ ΠΟΙΕΙΣΘΑΙ τας πιζας και Tus hoyes-i. e. " to argue through the medium of common and popu-" lar truths."—I do not know of any instance, in which mount ou την μιμησιν is used in any other way, or put simply for μιμεισθαι. I cannot, for example, conceive, that Aristotle, instead of, To TE γαρ ΜΙΜΕΙΣΘΑΙ συμφυτον τοι; ανθρωποις, (cap. iv.) would have written-το τε γαρ ΠΟΙΕΙΣΘΑΙ ΜΙΜΗΣΙΝ συμφυτον, &c. It appears to me, that, whether the phrase be used positively, or negatively, some imitation is equally implied; and this fentence—ει τις άπαντα τα μετρα μιγυυων ΟΥ ποιοιτο THN μιμητιν—I frould by no means think it accurate to translate—" If any one, mixing all forts of metre, " should not imitate; - but, (to construe literally for the sake of clearness,) "if any one should not make THE, (or, which is the " fame thing, HIS) imitation by mixing all forts of metre." This, I confess, appears clearly to me to be the fair English of that Greek; but as this certainly cannot be the meaning of Aristotle here, I must abandon the reading which gives it, and content myself with following that explanation, which is encumbered with the fewest difficultiesa. The fense, in this way, does not materially differ from that, which is given to the passage by those who adopt the reading of Victorius. The word, opones, has thus its proper force. So has, εκ ΗΔΗ, ΚΑΙ ποιητην προσαγορευτεον. As if Aristotle had faid-" Such a writer we might, certainly, on the first glance, " call, a versifier—a metre-maker—emonolov, exercionolov, &c. but we " fhould not immediately (HAH), merely on account of the variety of " his versification, allow him also the title of Post-KAI mongray " προσαγορευτεον."

I must, however, be again permitted to declare my doubt, as to the integrity of the text.—I have here given, as I have been obliged to do in many other places, that fense, which appears to me the best that can be given to the original as it stands; not that, upon which I can with any considence rely, as the clear meaning of the author.

² According to the version of Goulston—" Similiter verò etiam si quis omnia "metrorum genera uno in opere permiscens, imitationem institucrit, (quemadmodum "Chæremon, &c.) non statim Poetæ titulo, ob carmen, sed ob initationem, insigniendus." See also Castelvetro, p. 25, 26.

N O T E 11.

P. 4. As CHÆREMON HAS DONE IN HIS CENTAUR.

From some curious fragments of this Poet preserved, or, rather, half-preserved, in Athenaus, his genius appears to have been of a gay and voluptuous cast, and to have delighted in minute description of pleasurable objects. In the lines quoted by Athenaus from his Tragedy of Encus, which are a description of a group of beautiful virgins sporting by moon-light, there is certainly fome fancy, and fome elegance; but, of that kind, the effect of which is, perhaps, fomewhat counteracted by too much appearance of affectation and refearch. And this corresponds with the character given of this Poet by Aristotle, in his Rhetoric [lib. iii. cap. xii.] that he was, απριβης ώσπερ λογογραφ®; and of that class of Poets, whom he calls avayvasmo; that is, whose productions, as we commonly express it, read better than they act; are more adapted to the closet, than to the stage. The antient Poets, both Greek and Roman, were often, I believe, indebted, for their descriptive ideas, to Painting, or Sculpture. This paffage of Chæremon is certainly very pisturefque, and was, probably, fuggested by some painting on the fame subject.

Athenaus says of this Poet, that he was particularly fond of dwelling upon the description of flowers—immarapog in the arby?; and cites some lines of that kind from his Tragedies.

In his Centaur, which Atheneus calls δραμα πολυμετρου, we must understand, that even the dialogue was in various metres; for in the choral parts this would have been no innovation,

N O T E 12.

P. 68. POLYGNOTUS — PAUSON — DIONYSIUS.

Polygnotus and Pauson are also mentioned by Aristotle in his 8th book De Rep. cap. v. where, speaking of Painting with a view to education, he says, that "young men should not be permitted "to contemplate the works of Pauson, but those only of Polygo" notus, and of other artists who excelled in moral expression." It seems probable, from this passage, that the pictures of Pauson were not only of a ludicrous, but also of a licentious cast. To what a degree the abuse of this art was carried in Aristotle's time, appears from another passage, [Rep. lib. vii. cap. xvii.] in which he says, the magistrate should suffer no "licentious and indecent paintings or statues," such as would endanger the morals of youth: but the exception that follows is curious;—"Unless," he adds, "in the temples of some delities of that character, "whose legal and established worship consists in ludicrous and "wanton rites"."

While I am upon this subject, I cannot forbear adding a singular passage of Euripides, where Hippolytus, vindicating himself, and afferting his chastity, says, with a naïveté that, I sear, would hardly be received with decent gravity by a modern audience;—

Λεχες γαρ, εις τοδ΄ ήμερας, άγνον δεμας. Ουκ διδα ΠΡΑΞΙΝ ΤΗΝΔΕ, πλην λογώ κλυων, ΓΡΑΦΗΙ ΤΕ ΛΕΥΣΣΩΝ΄ έδε ταυτα γαρ σκοπειν Προθυμιώ είμι, ΠΑΡΘΕΝΟΝ ΨΥΧΗΝ έχων.

Hippol. v. 1003.

^{• —} Δει μη τα ΠΑΥΣΩΝΟΣ θεωρείν τες νέθς, άλλα τα ΠΟΛΥΓΝΩ ΤΟΥ, κ'α: $\frac{1}{4}$ τις $\frac{1}{4}$ υ $\frac{1}{2}$ υ γραφεών ή των άγαλματοποιών έγιν ήθιμ \odot . — $De\ Rep.$ viii. 5.

⁻ μηθεν μητε άγαλμα μητε γραφην έιναι ΤΟΙΟΥΤΩΝ ΠΡΑΞΕΩΝ ΜΙΜΗΣΙΝ· έι με σταρα τισι ΘΕΟΙΣ ΤΟΙΟΥΤΟΙΣ, δις και τον τωθασμου άποδιδωσιν $\hat{\sigma}$ τομ Φ ----

I am a stranger to the couch of love;
Nor know I of its rites more than the tale
May have informed me, or the Painter's pencil
Presented to mine eye; yet on such picture Dwells not mine eye delighted, for my mind
Is as a virgin's pure.—

[Mr. Potter's Translation, v. 1060.]

The Pauson mentioned by Aristotle was probably the same painter, whose poverty only is recorded by Suidas^c, and of whose wit we have a curious specimen in Ælian^d.

Of Dionysius, too, very little is known. That he excelled in natural representation and exact resemblance—in exhibiting men, such as he saw them, without ideal grace on the one hand, or exaggerated desormity on the other—is known, I believe, only from this passage of Aristotle. Dacier says this account is consirmed by Ælian; but I think he is mistaken. It appears to me, that the psyebs of which Ælian speaks, as the only difference between the paintings of Polygnotus and those of Dionysius, is literal, not figurative, magnitude. He says only, that the pictures of Dionysius, "except, that they were on a small scale, were exact imitations of Polygnotus, in the expression of passions and manners, the attitudes of the figures, the lightness and transparency of the draperies, and every other circumstance." It is not easy to see how Dionysius could copy so exactly, is are applearen, the expression.

^c Παυτών 🗇 πτωχότες 🕒, was proverbial. Suidas. And fee Aristoph. Plut. 602. The smooth. 958. Acharn. 854.

[&]quot; Lib. xiv. cap. xv.—And see Dacier's note on the passage of Aristotle.

^{*} ὁ μεν Π. λυγιατΦ ἐγραξε τα μεγαλα, και ἐν τοις ΤΕΛΕΙΟΙΣ ἐιργαζετο τα ἀθλα τα δε τε Διονουν, ΠΑΗΝ ΤΟΥ ΜΕΓΕΘΟΥΣ, την το Πολυγιατο τεχιην ἐμιμειτο ἐις την ἀπριβειαν, παθΦ, και σχηματων χρησιν, ἰματιαν λεπτοτητας, και τα λοιπα.—Ælian. iv. 3. If the finite of the whole paffage left room for doubt as to the fenfe of the word μεγεθΦ, it would, I think, be fufficiently fixed by what follows—ἐν ΤΕΛΕΙΟΙΣ. i. e. juftâ flaturâ, as rightly rendered by Perizonius; in large figures,—as large as life, &c. Dacier's wifoit a la perfection;" is nothing to the purpose.

fion, and the forms, or attitudes, of Polygnotus, without copying, at the same time, his greatness of manner, and his improvement of that nature which he imitated; for these seem entirely to depend upon those two circumstances, the expression of the countenance, and the airs and attitudes of the figures.

It feems, therefore, doubtful, whether Aristotle and Ælian speak of the same person. There must, in all probability, have been more painters than one, of that name; which was so common, that the writers so called, alone, furnished Meursius with matter for a whole book.—The pictures of Dionysius the Colophonian are mentioned by Plutarch⁸ as being painted with considerable strength of pencil, [—λοχυν ἐχοντα και τονον,] but in a manner which appeared forced and laboured, [εκβεβιασμενον,] and which he opposes to the freedom and facility of Nicomachus, who seems to have been the Fà Presto of the antient painters^h. This fault, so likely to be that of the artist who aims at an exact and scrupulous resemblance of the nature that is before his eyes, may, perhaps, afford some presumption, that Plutarch and Aristotle speak of the same painter.

What Aristotle says of these three styles of picturesque imitation, is easily applied to modern times. The productions, indeed, of these antient artists, were perithable and of short duration;—" At "genus immortale manet:" these specific characters have subsisted, and probably will subsist, in every period of the art. For the name of Polygnotus, it is obvious enough to substitute that of RAPHAEL, or other masters of the higher Italian schools. "When "a man," says Mr. Richardson, with that simplicity of enthusiasin, [&]quot;The painter has no other means of giving an idea of the dignity of the mind, but by that external appearance which grandeur of thought does generally, though not always, impress on the countenance; and by that correspondence of figure to sentiment and situation, which all men wish, but cannot command."—Sir Jos. Reynolds's Disc. on Painting, p. 111.

^g Life of Timoleon-vol. i. p. 461. Hen. Steph.

h Luca Giordano was called, Luca Fà Presto. Pliny says of Nicomachus—

"Nec fuit alius in eà arte velocior."—Lib. xxxv. cap. x.

which gives so amusing a singularity to his writings'—" When a man enters into that awful gallery at Hampton-court's, he finds himself amongst a fort of people superior to what he has ever seen, and very probably to what those really were." This is exactly the βελτιονας η καθ ήμας of Aristotle. "Michael Angelo," says the same author, "no where saw such living sigures as he cut in marble."—The Flemish and Dutch schools will supply plenty of substitutes for the Dionysii of antient painting—those, who, like Protogenes, "in picturâ verum esse, non verisimile, vo- lunt"." Rembrandt must occur to every body. Even Rubens took his sigures too much from the people before him." [Sir Jose Reynolds's Disc. p. 133.]

As for the Paulons, the buffoons of the art, they are to befeen in the windows of every print-shop. We must not, however, confound with these "Tom Browns of the mob," as Mr. Walpole calls them", the moral humour of Hogarth, or the sportive, but harmless; exaggerations of Mr. Bunbury. Hogarth, indeed, in general, and in his greatest works, seems rather to belong to the bighest class of the exact imitators of vulgar nature—

\[\tau\text{PAYAQN}. \] His Country-dance, however, may be mentioned as an example, and an admirable one, of exaggerated comic imitation, in which men are made, in some degree at least, "worse than they are"—XEIPOYE \(\text{EmaZE}. \)—And if any man can look at this print, or at the Family-piece, the Coffee-bouse Patriots, or the Long Story, of Mr. Bunbury, without feeling a high degree of that

¹ See Mr. Walpole's just apology for the fingularities of Richardson's style, and just censure of those, who saw nothing, in that sensible and original writer, but an object of derision.—Anecdotes of Painting.

^{*} Where the Cartoons then were.

¹ Theory of Painting, p. 96. Ed. 1773.

m Plin. lib. xxxv. cap. x. See his account of the laboriousness of that painter.——See also Ælian. Far. Hill. lib. xii. cap. xli. and Plut. in Denet. p. 1646. Ed. H.S.

[&]quot; Anec. of Painting, vol. iv. p. 149.

pleasure which arises from the perception of strong humour, he must, I think, be still more unprovided with a sense of the ridiculous, than even that Crassus, who is recorded to have laughed once, though once only, in his life.

N O T E 13.

P. 68. WITH THE MUSIC OF THE FLUTE AND OF THE EYRE.

Thus PLATO, in the very language of Aristotle, - τα περι τυς βυθμες και πασαν μεσικην έςι τροπων μιμηματα ΒΕΛΤΙΟΝΩΝ κα: XEI-PON Ω N AN Θ P Ω Π Ω N. A modern reader, that is, a person who reads an antient author with modern ideas, might be inclined to to ask, how men are to be represented as better, or worse, than they are, or how, indeed, reprefented at all, in a harpfichord lesson, or a solo for a German flute? But the same reader, supposing him in any degree conversant with music, would furely be at no lofs to conceive, that it admits of the difference of ferious and comic expression; and admits of it in various degrees, from the highest elevation and dignity of flyle, down to the coarse and vulgar jollity of the gavot, or the hornpipe. Now the meaning of Aristotle, put into modern mufical language, amounts, I apprehend, to no more than that. Suppose, then, the music, in these different styles, to be accompanied by words, relating the actions, or imitating the fpeech, of low, or elevated characters; we might fay, that the music was expressive of such actions, or characters; the antients would have faid, that it imitated them. On the contrary, suppose this music merely instrumental, we should, in general, only say, that it was grand, and fublime, or comic, mean, vulgar, &c. But the antients, from the close, and almost inseparable connection of their Music with Poetry, and particularly with the most imitative fort of Poetry, the Dramatic¹; and partly, also, from the nature of their Music itself⁴, would, in this case likewise, have retained much the same language, and would have considered this Music as imitative of the manners and passions of exalted, or vulgar characters, or even as representing those characters themselves.—But the different ideas, or rather, the different language, of the antients and the moderns on this subject, I have considered more fully, and endeavoured to account for, in the Second Differentian.

N O T E 14.

P. 68. CLEOPHON, AS THEY ARE.

It may be worth while to remark, that the character Aristotle gives of the diction of Cleophon²—that it was of the common and familiar kind, without Poetic elevation—corresponds with the account here given of the general object of his Poetry, the exact delineation of common nature and common life. He who means to represent men as they are, will also, of course, represent their language nearly as it is.

The only Poet of this name, of whom, I believe, any account is given, is recorded as a Tragic Poet': but Aristotle undoubtedly alludes here to a Poem of the narrative kind. In another part of his works he mentions a Poem of Cleophon, called Mandra-Bulus. From the proverbial expression—êms Mandraga Bede Xwges to measure (" worse and worse, like the affairs of Mandrabulus"—)

- P Diff. II. p. 81, &c. 9 Ibid. p. 85.
- * Part II. Seet. 26. Of the Orig. cap. xxii.
- b Suidas v. CLEOPHON. He gives the names of fome of his Tragedies.
- * De Seph. Elench. cap. xv. where we should, I suppose, for Μανδροβυλώ, read, Διαν ζ. Ασστη.

in Lucian⁴, and the account of its origin in Suidas, and Hefychius⁵, it feems very improbable that the Poem was a Tragedy. We may rather conclude it to have been of a comic cast; and it seems no unreasonable conjecture, to suppose, that it might be of the narrative kind; modelled, perhaps, in some respects, upon the Martines of Homer. At least, the two heroes seem to have been or kindred characters.

N O T E 15.

P. 68. HEGEMON—INVENTOR OF PARODIES.

See Athenæus, p. 698, 699, and 406, 407. And Fabric. Biblioth. Gr. lib. ii. cap. vii.—The Athenians were delighted with this fort of fun—of all expedients to raise a laugh, the cheapest, and, at the same time, the most infallible. Homer was the great and inexhaustible resource of these Parodists. The best and most considerable specimen remaining, of this kind of Poem, seems to be the Homeric description of an Attic supper by Matron, a great Parodist, and a great eater, in Athenæus, lib. iv. cap. v. Isaac Casaubon calls it, "Carmen ingeniosum, et leporis ac ve-"nustatis plenissimum."—The first three lines may serve as a specimen:—— Δειπνα μοι έννεπε, Μεσα, πολυτροτα και μαλα πολλα³, Ά Ξενοκλης όητως έν Αθηναις δειπνισεν ήμας, Ηλθον γας κ'ακεισε, πολυς δε μοι έτπετο λιμ[©].

The Poem, it must be confessed, has some pleasantry, and much dexterity of comical perversion. We cannot wonder at its effect

- d De Mercede conduct. 478. Ed. Benedict.
- · v. Επι τε Μανδραβελε.
- * Αιδρα μοι έννεπε, Μυσα, πολυτροπον, ός μαλα πολλα. Hom. Od. init.
- Ελλθον γαρ κ΄ ακεισε, πολυς δε μιι έσπετο λα. Ποπ.

upon a people, who had all Homer in their memories. It is easy to conceive the roar of the Athenian upper gallery, when, in the description of the cook, bringing in the supper, they heard this line:

Τφ δ' αρα τεσσερακοντα μελαιναι ΧΥΤΡΑΙ έποντο.

Sometimes the Parody depended on a pun; of which Athenaus gives, with great complacence, a curious example, in a fcrap from a Parody of Eubæus, defcribing a quarrel between a barber and a potter. The barber, whose wife, it seems, the other attempts to force from him, addresses the potter in the language of Nestor :-

Μητε συ τουδ', άγαθ περ εων, άποαιρεο ΚΟΥΡΗΝ,

Μητε συ, ΠΗΛΕΙΔΗ.

—where the joke depends on the allusion to $\Pi H \Lambda O \Sigma$, mud, or clay; and, probably, to the trade of the speaker, in the word regne; or, perhaps, to the instrument of his art, which we may suppose the actor of the Parody to have brandished at his adversary.—But I do not mean to take to myself the honour of this illustration of an Attic joke. It is to be found in the Poctics of J. C. Scaliger.—See Athen. p. 699. B.

N O T E 16.

P. 63. THE DELIAD.

The conjecture of Castelvetro, $\tau \eta \nu \Delta E I \lambda \iota \alpha \delta \alpha$, (which might be rendered, The Poltroniad,) was certainly ingenious, but, I think, unnecessary. Dacier's account is probably right; and both his idea, and the common reading, seem to receive some support from the similar national titles that are preserved of other pieces of this Poet; such as, $K \rho \eta \tau \varepsilon \varsigma$, $\Lambda \alpha \varkappa \omega \nu \varepsilon \varsigma$, $\Lambda \eta \mu \nu \nu \alpha \iota$.—See Suidas and Fabricius.

^{*} Τω δ' αρα πεσσεραμοντα μελαιναι νητες έποντο. Hom. in Catal. passim.

[&]quot; Sec Il. I. 275, &c.

N O T E 17.

P. 68. So, AGAIN, WITH RESPECT TO DITHYRAMBICS AND NOMES.

The expression, in this passage, is too general, and too little is known of the examples mentioned in it, to admit of perfect satisfaction, with respect to any thing farther than its general meaning; i. e. that both Dithyrambic and Nomic Poetry admitted the same differences in the objects of their imitation. For so, I think, the sense requires us to understand; not, that the imitation of beroic characters was appropriated to the one, and that of light characters to the other. Both these species of Poetry were hymns; and though the Dithyrambic, or hymn to Bacchus, might, indeed, from its wild and free character, be privileged with a greater latitude and variety of imitation, yet I know of no authority that will warrant our going so far, as to suppose, that they were essentially distinguished from each other in this respect, like Tragedy and Comedy.

The construction of the Greek I understand to be this:—μιμησαιτο αν τις, ως Τιμοθε© και Φιλοξεν® [sc. εμιμησαντο] Περσας και Κυκλωπας.

I am aftonished, that any commentators should have taken either of the compositions here mentioned for dramas; an idea totally repugnant to the plain sense of the whole passage, and to the evident purpose for which these examples are cited. With respect to the Πεςσαι, the passage of Pausanias may be regarded as decisive; —Πυλαδε—αδουτ. Τιμοθεε ΝΟΜΟΝ, τε Μιλησιε, ΠΕΡΣΑΣ.

² Yet so the last Ox. editor seems to understand:—" Hoe differre Nomos à Dithyrambis, quod illis personas graves, his leves imitarentur. p. 273.

b Pauf. Arcad.—And the Poem began with an hexameter verse which is there quoted. Yet Fabricius calls it a Tragedy.

The Poem of Philoxenus here meant must, clearly, have been either a Nome, or a Dithyrambic Poem; most probably, the latter. Philoxenus is recorded as a Dithyrambic Poet; and Aristotle's illustration will be more complete, if we understand him to exemplify in cack of the kinds of Poetry in question. It is by no means certain, that the Cycless of Philoxenus mentioned by Athenaus, Ælian, and others, is the piece here alluded to: and, if it were, which, undoubtedly, appears rather probable, I know of no sufficient proof that it was a Drama, as it has been repeatedly called. If Ælian is to be regarded, it certainly was not; for he calls it μελος—a term appropriated to Lyric Poetry.—τον ΚΥΚ-ΛΩΠΑ ειργασατο, των έωυτε ΜΕΛΩΝ το καλλισον.

I mentioned, in the conclusion of NOTE 1. a problem of Aristotle, from which it appears, that the Dithyrambic Poetry was not originally initative, but became so by degrees. It is the 15th of the Harmonic Problems, Sect. 19. It is there said, that the Dithyrambics, after they became imitative, laid aside the antistrophical form, (i. e. the division into corresponding stanzas,) in which, before, they had been composed. And the reason assigned for this is, that, originally, these Dithyrambic hymns were performed by chorusses of gentlemen, [exercises.] who could not sing in the style of artists, and professors: [armsus addentify the words were, therefore, set to the simplest kind of melody, such as that, in which the same air is repeated to similar stanzas, as in our ballads.

- e Æl. Var. Hift. lib. xii, cap. 44.
- 4 Autispop \oplus —ISH, OMOIA. Hefyeh.
- - Επειδαν μιμητικοι έγενοντο, έμετι έχνσιν άντισροφικς, προτερον δε έιχον.

That, in the Strophe and Antistrophe of the Greek Ode, the same musical strain was repeated, is clear from Dionys. Hal. de Struct. Orat. § 19. τος δε τα μέλη χαφεσι, κ. τ. αλ. And also from what Aristotle, in this Prob. says of the Nomes, which were not antistrophical, and the melodies of which, as well as the words, τη μιμησει έκουσθεί ΔΕΙ ΕΤΕΡΑ γασμένες.

^τ Διὸ ἀπλωτεςα ἐποιεντο ἀυτοις τα μελα· ἡ δε ἀντισροφ⊕ ἀπλων· ἀριθμ⊕ γας ἐκι και ἐνι μιτρειτα.: i. c. (if I understand it rightly,) it confists of a number of parts that have one common meastire.

But afterwards, it feeras, the performance of these hynnis, like that of the Nomes, was left to professed musicians, the egangas, or mafters of the art, who continded with each other in trials of fkill, and who were, of course, to exert all their imitative powers. The fymmetry of flrophe and antiffrophe, and the famplicity of air regularly repeated, were ill adapted to this purpose, which required length, variety, and frequent changes? of metre, melody, rhythm, mode, genus, &c. in conformity to the various fubjects of imitation, and transitions of expression. This account, which affords fome little glimple of curious information, with respect both to the Nomic and Dithyrambic hymn, is confirmed, as far as the latter is concerned, by Dionysius Halicarn. De Sirusturi Orat. Sect. 19. He there traces the progress of all this Lyric corruption, and names Timotheus and Philoxenus as the principal authors of these licentious and wicked innovations-" for, " in the time of the old Poets," he fays, " the Dithyrambic ode was an orderly and regular compositioni."

Plutarch, too, in the Dialogue Heque Medians, speaks exactly the same language. Timotheus and Philoxenus are there repeatedly stigmatized as corrupters of the good old music; and the Hardagea and Espanded to the Proofers, is opposed to the Proofers, with a zeal similar to that, with which, in modern music, we sometimes hear the style of Corelli and Geminiani opposed and preferred to the heterodox novelties of Haydn and Boccherini.

A a 2

² See Dr. Burney's Hift. of Mush, vol. i. p. 61, &c.

h — ἀγωνισων—ἀν ήδη μημεισθια δυναμενών και διατεινεσθαι, ή ώδη ἐγινετο μανρα και πολυειδης. καθαπερ ἐν τα PHMATA, και τα ΜΕΛΗ τη μιμητει ἐπολυθει, ἀει ἐτεςα γιντμενα.—He adds, μαλλον γαρ τη μελει ἀναγνει μημεισθει ή τοις ἐηματο: —by which, I fuppose, he means, that in this union of poetical and musical imitation in the Nomes, the musical imitation was considered as the principal and most essential object.

 $^{^{}i}$ — παρα γε τοις άρχαιοις ΤΕΤΑΓΜΕΝΟΣ ΗΝ Ο ΔΙΘΥΡΑΜΒΟΣ. What he means by τεταγμεν Θ is fufficiently explained in the first paragraph of the same section.

k Plut. Ed. H. Steph. p. 2092, and 2084.

The manner, in which Aristotle, in this Problem, speaks of the Nomes, when compared with his expressions relative to the Dithyrambics, rather leads one to suppose, that the former were not, even originally, composed in the antistrophic form: the least, however, that can be inferred from it, is, that they discarded that form, and, consequently, became complicated, artificial, and imitative, long before a similar revolution took place in the Dithyrambic Poetry and Music.—I may, also, observe that the variety of imitation, and changes of expression, clearly attributed by Aristotle to the Nomes, seem to confirm what I said above—that they did not exclude the same variety, in the objects of their imitation, which the Dithyrambic Poem confessedly admitted.

I will just add, that this Problem of Aristotle throws light upon a passage in his Rhetoric, which has embarrassed his commentators. He there [lib. iii. cap. 9.] compares the diction that is divided into periods, to the Antistrophic Odes " of the old Poets:" but, the λοξις ειρομενη, in which the sentence has no other unity than that which copulatives give it", nor any other measure than the completion of the sense, and the necessity of taking breath", or, as Cicero, in sew words, so admirably describes it, "illa sine" intervallis loquacitas perennis et profluens"—this Aristotle compares to what he calls the αναβολαι in Dithyrambic Poetry; meaning, I think, evidently, the long, irreguiar, protracted Odes of the more modern Dithyrambic Poets; such as those, of which he speaks in the Problem. For the word, Αναβολη, here, does not, I believe, signify exordium, procemium, as usually understood, but was, probably, the name by which these αδαι μαμραι και πολυειδεις?

¹ Δια τι δι μεν Νομοι δκ έν αντιεξοροις ΕΠΟΙΟΥΝΤΟ;—and, δι Νομοι ανγωνικών ΗΣΑΝ.

τη - τη συνίεσμω μιαν.

[&]quot; h κδιν έχει τελΦ καθ αυτην, αν μη το πραγμα τεγεμενον τελεικθ. The periodic diction, as opposed to this, he calls έναναπνευςΦ. [§ 3.]—Ille rudis, inconditè fundit quantum puty l, et id quod dicit stilltu, non ARTE, determinat.—Cic. de Or iii. 44.

[·] De Or. iii. 18.

[&]quot; * e Sec nota n were distinguished, and opposed to the old and simple Dithyrambic in stanzas.

N O T E 18.

P. 68. EITHER IN NARRATION,—AND THAT, AGAIN, EITHER, &c.

It may safely be pronounced, that the original here, either is not as Aristotle left it, or, was carelessly and ambiguously written. As the ambiguity, however, does not affect the general sense of the passage, it is scarcely worth while to engage in a minute discussion of the comparative merits of the two different constructions, which have been adopted by different commentators and translators. The learned reader knows, or may see, what has been said on both sides. I have preferred that construction, which has always appeared to me to result most obviously and naturally from the words of the original.—ἐν τοις αυτοις, και τα ἀυτα μιμεισθαι ἐςιν, ὁτε μεν ΑΠΑΓΓΕΛ-ΛΟΝΤΑ (ἢ ἑτεξον τι γιγιομενον, ὡσπες ὑμηρων ποιει, ἢ ὡς τον ἀυτον, και μη μεταβαλλοντα,) η ποντας ὡς ΠΡΑΤΤΟΝΤΑΣ και ἐνεργαντας τας μιμεμενες.—

In the other, and most usual way of taking this passage, the mixture of mere narration, and dr matic imitation, in the Epic species, is expressed by the words, ότε μεν ἀπαγγελλοντα, ἢ έτερον τι γιγνομενον. But it seems not likely, that Aristotle would thus oppose the word ἀπαγγελλοντα, to έτερον τι γιγνομενον; because the term, ἀπαγγελια, is constantly applied by him, throughout the treatise, to the narrative species in general: it is opposed, not to the dramatic part of the Epic, but to the drama itself. Απαγγελια and διηγησις, are used by him as synonymous terms, and are both applied to the whole of the Homeric, or dramatic, Epic Poem^a.

On the other hand, the words— $\hat{\eta}$ ETEPON τ_i γιγνορείου—seem evidently opposed to— $\hat{\eta}$ $\hat{\omega}_i$ TON ATTON και μη μεταβαλλοντα, and should, therefore, be joined with them, not with $\hat{\alpha}\pi\alpha\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\lambda\alpha\nu\tau\alpha$.— Lastly, in this way of understanding the passage, Aristotle divides the different manners of imitation, as he might naturally be expected to divide them, into those which characterize the two great and principal species, of which he means to treat—the NARRATIVE and the DRAMATIC. The two different modes of the former, i. e. the pure narrative, and the dramatic narrative, are, with more propriety than in the other construction, (in his view of the subject, at least,) slung into a subdivision.

In either construction, however, Aristotle agrees with Plato in enumerating three kinds of Poetry, the purely dramatic, the purely narrative, and the mixed. But the generality of the commentators seem, too hastily, to have taken it for granted, that Aristotle must therefore necessarily enumerate them in the same manner; and they have, accordingly, moulded the slexible and ambiguous construction of this pussage, exactly upon the division of Plato.

I was glid to find myfelf supported here by the judgment of the accurate Piccolomini, whose version coincides with mine.— In un modo, per via di narratione,— queste, ò ponendo se stesso alle voite il Poeta in persona d'altri, come sa Homero, over conservando sempre la propria persona non mutata mai. Nel ALTRO Modo poi, introducendo persone à trattare et negotiare, come se le stesse persone che sono imitate, sussero.

With respect to the imitation here expressly allowed by Aristotle to subsist even in mere narration, without the intermixture of any thing dramatic, see Diss. I. p. 26.

b Plato, Rep. lib. iii. p. 392, D, to 394, D, Ed. Serrani. But, for the difference of Plato's doctrine, or rather of his language, from that of Aristotle, see Diff. I. p. 40.

See, particularly, II. Cafaubon, De Sat. Poof. cap. iii. init. I agree perfectly with Mr. Winftanley, that his emendations are not necessary.

N O T E 19.

P. 69. ELEVATED CHARACTERS— $Gr. \Sigma \Pi O \Upsilon \Delta A I O \Upsilon \Sigma$.

The adjective $\Sigma \pi \nu \partial \omega \otimes$, and its opposite, $\Phi \omega \nu \otimes$, are words of considerable latitude. They, each of them, comprehend a number of different, though related, ideas, for which we have not, that I know of, any common word. Propriety itself, therefore, requires of a translator that, which, at first view, seems contrary to propriety—that he should render each of those words differently in different places. To have translated $\sigma \pi \nu \partial \omega \nu$, here, "good," or "virtuous," as it may generally be translated, would only have been giving an English word with a Greek idea, which none but readers of Greek would have assisted to it.

The Greeks appear to have applied the word, SHOYLAION, to whatever was, on any occount, die oneship—whatever was reflect-able, important, admirable, ferious, valuable, &c. as opposed to PAYAON, which was applied, not to vice only, but to whatever was contemptible, trifling, light, ordinary, ridiculous—or, as we say in familiar English, good for nothing. Hence the various senses of both these words in the Greek writers, according as they were applied to persons, and things, that were the objects of esteem, or contempt, on different accounts. Sometimes, therefore, oneshis may be rendered by "good;" sometimes by "serious, "earnest," &c.—Sometimes, as in this passage, and in the definition of Tragedy, by "elevated," "important," &c.

Suidas explains the word, not only by Evaçet®, but by $\Sigma O\Phi O\Sigma$, and $E\Upsilon \Delta OKIMO\Sigma$. See also the article, $\Phi \alpha \nu \lambda \otimes \omega$. Hefychius gives, a Demosthenes has this expression:— à μετριας και ΦΑΥΛΑΣ λαξων πληγας—Orat. κατα Κοιων.—So, bad, is sometimes used in familiar English, for, trifing: "no bad blovs."

b Thus, Dacier—les gens les plus considerables.—Piccolomini—persone grave:—attione grave et magnifica.—Heinsius—honessos. Gouliton,—prastantes, &c.

as fynonymous to $\Phi \alpha \nu \lambda \otimes \nu$, not only the general word, Kar \otimes , but, EYTEAH Σ —'AΠΛΟΥ Σ —KATAΓΕΛΑΣΤΟΣ. And Phavorinus— $\varphi \alpha \nu \lambda \nu \nu$, το κακον, και το ἐυτελες, και το μιπρον, και ΟΥΔΑΜΙΝΟΝ—Angl. "good for nothing."

Some kind of virtue, in the extended sense given to the word APETH by the antient writers on morals, was, indeed, always implied in the epithet Σπεδαιω; but it included such good qualities, and endowments, as we do not usually call virtues; or, at least, such as we never include in our idea of a virtuous man^c: as, wisdom, courage, eloquence, &c.—Thus Aristotle himself;—το δε ΣΠΟΥΔΑΙΟΝ ἐνναι, εςι το ΤΑΣ ΑΡΕΤΑΣ ἐχειν α. And what are these virtues?— they are—" all laudable babits."—των ἐξεων τας ΕΠΑΙΝΕΤΑΣ, ΑΡΕΤΑΣ λεγομεν c.

The subject of Criticism is necessarily connected, in some degree, with that of Ethics; and unless we understand well the moral language of any writer, we cannot be competent judges of his criticism.

N O T E 20.

P. 69. In support of these claims they argue from the words themselves.

Ποιεμενει τα δνοματα σημαον.—The participle, ποιεμενοι, should be applied, I think, to all the Dorians—not confined, as in Dacier's translation, to those of Peloponnesus. See Goulston's version, which appears to me to be right.

Aristotle begins by faying expressly, that the Dorians, in general, laid claim to both Tragedy and Comedy, on account of the term

- See Hume's Principles of Morals, Sect. 6. Part I.—particularly p. 111, &c.—and the note, p. 104.
 - d Mug. Moral. i. 1.
- e Eth. Nicom.—End of Book I.—I may also refer the reader, on this subject, to Cic. de Or. lib. ii. cap. 84. "Virtus autem, quæ est per se ipsa laudabilis," &c.

ΔΡΑΜΑ, which was a Doric word:—ΔΙΟ (i. e. from the term Δραματα, just before mentioned,) ἀντιποιενται της τε Τραγωδίας και της Κωμωδίας ΟΙ ΔΩΡΙΕΙΣ.—He then mentions the peculiar claims of the Megarians to Comedy, and of the Dorians of Peloponnesus to Tragedy; throwing in, parenthetically, some other arguments on which the former also founded their title to the invention of Comedy: after which, he returns, at the word ποιεμενοι, to shew, how these people concurred in arguing from the etymology of the words themselves; all of them, from the word δραμα, as it was common to Tragedy and Comedy, and they, who laid claim to Comedy, both from that, and also from the derivation of the word Κωμωδία.

The construction, in this way, is, I confess, somewhat parenthetical and embarrassed; but the reader, who is accustomed to the style of Aristotle, will not, I believe, consider this as affording alone any sufficient presumption against the explanation here given.

N O T E 21.

P. 70. THE FIGURES OF THE MEANEST AND MOST DIS-GUSTING ANIMALS.——

Θηρίων τε μορφας των ΑΤΙΜΟΤΑΤΩΝ.—This reading is strongly supported by the arguments of Victorius, the authority of MSS, and the sense and purport of the passage itself, which seems to require instances of mean, or disgusting, rather than of terrible, objects. Thus too Plutarch, in the passages referred to by Victorius, which undoubtedly allude to this of Aristotle.—Γεγραμμενην ΣΑΥ-ΡΑΝ η ΠΙΘΗΚΟΝ,—ιδοντες ήδομεθα και θαυμαζομέν, ουχ ώς καλον, άλλ ώς δμοιον εσια γαρ ε δυναται καλον γενέσθαι ΤΟ ΑΙΣΧΡΟΝ—κ. τ. αλ.—Απα presently after—και ΝΟΣΩΔΗ μεν ΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΝ, και ΥΠΟΥΛΟΝ, ώς ἀτερπες θεανια, φευγομεν κ. τ. αλ.—See also his Sympos. Problems, lib. v. Prob. 1.

N O T E 22.

P. 70. To LEARN IS A NATURAL PLEASURE

To the same purpose, in his Rhetoric, lib. i. cap. xi. p. 537. Ed. Duval. Επει δε το ΜΑΝΘΑΝΕΙΝ τε ήδυ, και το θαυμαζαν, και τα τοιαυτα, αναγκη ήδεα είναι, το τε μεμιμημενον, ώσπες ΓΡΑΦΙΚΗ, και ΑΝΔΡΙΑΝΤΟΠΟΙΙΑ, και ΠΟΙΗΤΙΚΗ, και παν ὁ αν ευ μεμιμημενον ή, καν μη ή ήδυ ε το μιμημα ε γας επι τετω χαιςα, αλλα συλλογισμω εςι, ότι ΤΟΥΤΟ ΕΚΕΙΝΟ ώς ΜΑΝΘΑΝΕΙΝ τι συμβαινα.—" And as it is by nature delightful to LEARN, to ADMIRE, and the like, hence we necessarily receive pleasure from imitative arts, as PAINTING, Sculpture, and Poetry, and from whatever is well imitated, even though the original may be disagreeable; for our pleasure does not arise from the beauty of the thing itself,

"but from the inference—the discovery, that "This is That,"

" &c. fo that we feem to LEARN fomething."

Mavθavew—to learn, to know, i. e. merely to recognize, discover, &c. See Harris, On Music, Painting, &c. ch. iv. note (b). The meaning is sufficiently explained by what follows. Dryden, who scarce ever mentions Aristotle without discovering that he had looked only at the wrong side of the tapestry, says—" Aristotle tells us, that imitation pleases because it affords matter for a rea-

- ² I cannot but suspect this reading. It was perhaps, originally, το τε MIMOT-MENON: otherwise, μεμιμπμενον must here be taken actively, which, though not unusual, is in this place, I think, improbable, because the same participle immediately follows, in the passive sense.
- "Methinkes this translating," fays Don Quixote, "is just like looking upon the wrong fide of arras hangings; that although the pictures be seene, yet they are "full of thred-ends, that darken them, and they are not seene with the plainnesse and finoothnesse as on the other side." Shelton's Don Quixote. See. part, ch. lxii.

" foner to enquire into the truth or falsehood of imitation," &c. a But Aristotle is not here speaking of reasoners, or inquiry; but, on the contrary, of the vulgar, the generality of mankind, whom he expressly opposes to philosophers, or reasoners: and his συλλογίζεσθαι is no more than that rapid, habitual, and imperceptible act of the mind, that "raisonnement aussi prompt que le coup d'œil," (as it is well paraphrased by M. Batteux,) by which we collect, or inser, from a comparison of the picture with the image of the original in our minds, that it was intended to represent that original.

The fullest illustration of this passage is to be found in another work of Aristotle, his Rhetoric, lib. iii. cap. x.°, where he applies the same principle to metaphorical language, and resolves the pleasure we receive from such language, into that which arises from the $\mu\alpha\theta\eta\sigma\iota\varsigma$ TAXEIA—the exercise of our understandings in discovering the meaning, by a quick and easy perception of some quality or qualities common to the thing expressed, and the thing intended—to a mirror, for example, and to the theatre, when the latter is is called metaphorically, "The mirror of human life"."

In the Problems, Sect. 19, Prob. V. the same principle is applied to Music. The Problem is, Why we are more pleased with singing when we are acquainted with the air that is sung, than when it is new to us?—And one of the answers is, δτι ήδυ το μανθανεν—i. e. to say, this is such a tune, or song, &c. And indeed the pleasure afforded by recognition, is no where, perhaps, more visibly illustrated, than in the raptures and rhythmical agitation of a popular Dryden feems to have taken his idea from Dacier's note on this place, which is extremely confused, and so expressed, as to leave it doubtful, whether he misunderstood the original, or only explained himself awkwardly.—The use that Dryden made of French critics and translators is well known. He commends "Dacier's late excellent "translation of Aristotle," in the Paral. between Poet. and Paint. just before the passage above quoted.

e Ed. Duval. In other Ed. differently divided, cap. vi.

See Harris's Philol. Inq. p. 190, and note *.

audience, at the return of the leading air, in that species of infallible ear-trap, the Rondeau.—I must add, as somewhat amusing, that Plato makes use of this principle to prove a dog to be a philosophical animal: "for, (he argues,) το φιλομαθες και φιλοσοφον, "τ'αυτον, the love of knowing, and the love of wisdom, are one sand the same thing. Now dogs are delighted with knowing, "simply, and disinterestedly; they sawn upon every one whom they know, and bark at the approach of every strangers; and that, without having ever experienced good from the one, or harm from the other."

The philosophy of Aristotle here, though undoubtedly true, as far as it goes, will, I am afraid, to those who examine it, hardly appear to be perfectly fatisfactory, or to reach the bottom of the subject. It is however to be confidered, that what he has said, feems applicable chiefly to rude and unskilful spectators, and should, perhaps, be confidered as a description of the effect of a picture or a statue upon children, and the multitude, who are little accustomed to view works of imitative art. And even with respect to. them, the principle feenis fearcely applicable but to portraits, and individual refemblances, such as may not be instantly recognized. When we look at a picture of that kind, we may not discover, till after a comparison of, at least, a few moments, that it is an imitation of this or that person; but, that it is an imitation of a man, we see at once; and where there is not even a momentary ignorance, or doubt, I do not see how any information can be faid to be acquired by the spectator, nor how, on the philosopher's

Rep. ii. p. 376. Serran.

^{*} Every person, of whom, in Aristotle's language, they cannot fay—'Ουτ & ἐμειι Φ. "
This is he."

h 'Ον μεν αν ίδη ΑΓΝΩΤΑ, χαλεπαινει, έδεν δη κακον προψεπονθως ' δ' αν ΓΝΩΡΙΜΟΝ, απαζεται, κ' αν μηδεν πωποτε ύπ' άυτε άγαθον πεποιθοι.——Αλλα μην κομφυν γε φαινεται το παδΘ άυτε της φυσεως, και ΩΣ ΑΛΗΘΩΣ ΦΙΛΟΣΟΦΟΝ; κ. τ. αλ.

¹ See below, note 1.

own principles, (if I rightly understand him,) the pleasure conveyed by the imitation, can, in any sense, be resolved into that, which the mind receives from the exertion of its own powers in inferring, or discovering, the resemblance.—I say, on Aristotle's own principles, because, in the passage above referred to where he explains himself more fully in applying the principle to metaphor, he expressly allows, that this pleasure of recognition, is not associated by proper or common words, since they instantly suggest their meaning and cannot be mistaken. Now a painting, considered as an imitation of a man, a horse, a house, in general, obviviously answers in this respect, unless the imitation be grossly impersect, to the common and familiar word; the one suggesting its original, as readily and immediately, as the other suggests its idea.

Among Aristotle's illustrations of this physical principle of the pleasure of felf-information, as it might be called, there are two short passages, in particular, which seem to be so explicit with regard to the nature of that pleasure, that I will venture to add to the length of this note by a transcript and translation of them both. They will, I think, satisfy the learned reader that I have not, in the foregoing remarks, misrepresented the philosopher's meaning.

After having applied the principle to metaphor, he applies it in like manner to the enthymemes, or arguments, of the orator.

k Rhet. iii. 10.

^{1—}τα δε κυρια IΣΜΕΝ.—" The Stagirite having told us what a natural pleasure we "derive from information, and having told us that, in the subject of words, exotic "words want that pleasure from being obscure, and common words from being too well "known," adds, &c. Harris, Phil. Inq. p. 190, note *.

^{*} As it was, when Painting was in its infant state—in γαναξι και σπαργακις—according to the quaint expression of Ælian, High Var. x. 10.—of which he seems to have been fond; for it occurs before lib. viii. cap. 8. It seems very properly guarded, in both places, by a—τροπου τικά.—The old painters of whom Ælian speaks were little aware of Aristotle's principle, when they wrote under their pictures—Τατο βες—Επεινο ίπτω—Τατο δινέρου.

Διο έτε τα έπιπολαια των ἐνθυμηματων ἐυδοκιμει (ἐπιπολαια γαρ λεγομεν τα παντι δηλα, και Α ΜΗΔΕΝ ΔΕΙ ΖΗΤΗΣΑΙ) ἐτε όσα ἐιρημενα ἀγνοκμενα ἐςι ἀλλ όσων, ἡ άμα λεγομενων ἡ γνωσις γινεται, και ἐι μη προτερον ὑπηρχεν, ἡ μικρον ὑςεριζει ἡ διανοια γινεται γαρ ΌΙΟΝ ΜΑΘΗΣΙΣ ἐκεινως δε, ἐδετερον...

"For the same reason, we are pleased, neither with supersicial arguments, (by which we mean such as are obvious to every one, and require no thought or search in the hearer;) nor with such as we do not understand when we have heard them; but, with those, which the mind apprehends, either while we hear them, (though not at sirst,) or in the moment after they are described:—for by these, we, in a manner, LEARN something: by the others, we learn nothing in either of these ways."

The other passage, in which the nature of the pleasure that Aristotle means is still more expressly marked, is this:

Παντων δε των—συλλογισμων θορυβειται μαλιςα τα τοιαυτα οσα άρχομενα ΠΡΟΟΡΩΣΙ, μη τω επιπολης ειναι άμα γας και ΑΥΤΟΙ ΕΦ ΕΑΥΤΟΙΣ ΧΑΙΡΟΥΣΙ προαισθανομενοι και όσων τοσυτον ύς εριζεσιν, ώσθ άμα ειρημενων γνωρίζειν.

"Of all arguments, those are most applauded, of which the audience have no sooner heard the beginning, than they forese the conclusion;—not, however, from their being trite and obvious; for they are pleased, [not only with the ingenuity of the speaker, but] at the same time, WITH THEMSELVES and their

m Rhet. iii. 10.

n ἐδετεζου—i. e. neither while we hear them, nor as foon as we have heard them.

Rhet. ii. cap. xxiii. Duval. In some other editions, cap. xix.

P " applauded"—θορυβειται. The commentators strangely mistake the sense of this word here, and in lib. i. e. ii. They render it, absurdly,—vehementiùs percellunt—perturbant maximè, &c.—Whether an audience be pleased, or displeased, to any great degree, noise is equally the consequence; and the word θορυβειν is used, sometimes for the uproar of approbation, and sometimes for that of dislike.

I infert these words, because, though not in the original, they seem plainly implied in the expression—'AMA yas KAI auta, &c.

"own fagacity.—Those arguments, also, afford pleasure, which, the moment after they are delivered, we are no longer at a loss to "apprehend."

N O T E 23.

P. 70. IN A MORE TRANSIENT AND COMPENDIOUS MAN-

Eπι βραχυ:—literally, " for a short time." As PLATO, Rep. iii. p. 396, κατα βραχυ, for a moment—en passant. Dacier's explanation—Quoi qu'ils ne soient pas tous egalement propres à apprendre,—is, surely, wide of Aristotle's purpose. None of the versions, that I have seen, seem to give the exact idea, except that of Heinsius:—" Quamquam minor BREVIORQUE ad hos perveniat voluptas."

N O T E 24.

P. 70. From the workmanship.——

Δια την ΑΠΕΡΓΑΣΙΑΝ—" neatnefs"—" finishing," &c. In the following passages of Plato, it is opposed to a slight sketch:—παν αυτων τετων [sc. δικαιοσυνης, σωφροσυνης, &c.] εχ ΎΠΟΓΡΑΦΗΝ δεί, ώσπες νυν θεασασθαί, άλλα την τελεωτατην ΑΡΕΡΓΑΣΙΑΝ μη παριεναι Rep. vi. p. 504. So again, lib. viii. p. 548, the verb, ἀπεργαζεσθαί, is opposed to ὑπογραφείν.

N O T E 25.

P. 70. METRE—A SPECIES OF RHYTHM.

Moqua—parts.—The following passage will ascertain the sense of the word in this place, and justify my version. Explaining the different disterent senses in which the word Meg® was used, Aristotle says,— ετι, εις α το είδω διαιρεθειη αν, ανευ τε Ποσε, και ταυτα ΜΟΡΙΑ λεγεται τετε διο τα ΕΙΔΗ, τε ΓΕΝΟΥΣ φασιν είναι ΜΟΡΙΑ.—Metaphys. lib. v.
cap. 25.—So, in this treatise, cap. 5.—τε Λισχος εςι το Γελοιον ΜΟΡΙΟΝ—" a part, or species, of the ridiculous."

N O T E 26.

P. 70. Those Persons, in whom, originally, these propensities were the strongest, &c.

It is obvious to remark here, that Aristotle, in this deduction of the art from the mimetic and musical instincts, includes verse in his idea of Poetry, which he, at least, considered as imperfect without it. All that he drops, elsewhere, to the disparagement of metre, must be understood only comparatively: it goes no farther, than to say, that imitation, that is, siction and invention, without verse, deserves the title of Poetry, or Making, better than verse without imitation.

An eminent writer has adjusted this matter, and set it on its true and solid basis, in his Dissertation On the idea of Universal Poetry*. What is there said, of "the origin and first application "of Poetry among all nations," will furnish the best comment I can give, upon the passage which is the subject of this note.

"Poetry is every where of the most early growth, preceding every other fort of composition; and being destined for the ear, that is, to be either sung, or at least recited, it adapts itself, even in its first rude essays, to that sense of measure, and proportion in sounds, which is so natural to us. The hearer's attention is the sooner gained by this means, his entertainment quickened, and his admiration of the performer's art excited. Men are ambi-

^a Dr. Hurd's Horace, vol. ii.

"tious of pleasing, and ingenious in refining upon what they observe will please. So that musical cadences and harmonious founds, which nature dictated, are farther softened and improved by art, till Poetry become as ravishing to the ear, as the images, it presents, are to the imagination. In process of time, what was at first the extemporaneous production of genius or passion, under the conduct of a natural ear, becomes the labour of the closet, and is conducted by artificial rules; yet still, with a secret reference to the sense of hearing, and to that acceptation which melodious sounds meet with in the recital of expressive words."

N O T E 27.

P. 71. MARGITES.

The scraps that have been preserved of this Poem, the Duncial of Homes, are so sew, and so short, that it may be worth while, for the convenience of the reader, to collect them.—

Μεσαων θεραπων και έκηβολε Απολλων 🔊 ,

—a line as likely to be found in one kind of Poem as in another, and which affords about as good a fample of this Poem, as a brick does of the building from which it was taken.—The other fragments are a little more interesting, as they give some idea of the hero of the Poem.

ΤΟΝΔ' ετ' αυ σκαπτηρα θεοι θεσαν, ετ' αροτηςα, Ουτ' αλλως τι σοφον' πασης δ' ήμαςτανε τεχιης. Πολλ' ήπιςατο έργα, κακως δ' ήπιςατο παντα.

- * Cited by the Scholiast on the Aves of Aristophanes, v. 914.
- b Preserved by Aristotle, Eth. lib. vi. cap. 7, as far as the word sepon. The remainder of the second line is in Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. i.
 - Plato, Al. B. Secund. p. 147. Ed. Serrani.

—This last stroke of character is not peculiarly antique. The line is of easy application in all times. It is not so easy to reconcile it with some other accounts, which seem to make Margites a downright idiot; such as, his not being able to number beyond five; his abstaining from all intercourse with his bride, lest she should complain of him to her mother, &c⁴.—One cannot well conceive, how such a man should, as Homer expressly says, whow bow to do many things; even though he did them ever so ill. But a tale, still more ridiculous, is told of this curious perfonage by Eustathius.

N O T E 28.

P. 71. HIS MARGITES BEARS THE SAME ANALOGY TO COMEDY, AS HIS ILIAD AND ODYSSEY TO TRAGEDY.

Whenever Aristotle speaks of Comedy, we must remember, that he speaks of the Old, or Middle Comedy, which was no other than what we should call farce, and to which his definition of Comedy was adapted: μιμησις φαυλοτερων; that is, as he explains himself, "an imitation of Ridiculous characters"."—This remark is necessary to explain what is here said of the Margites. A Poem, which, as far we can form any idea of it, celebrated the blunders and absurdities of an idiot, cannot well be conceived to have been analogous to any thing, that would now be denominated a Comedy. It seems to verge to the very bottom of the dramatic scale; "jusq' au boussion; celui-ci sera l'extrême de la Comedie, d Suidas, Art. MARGITES.

^{*} Eustath. ad Hom. Odyss. K.—See also Kuster's note on Suidas, Art. MAR-GITES.

² Chap. v. Translation, § 8. Part I. And see Dr. Hurd's Diff. on the Provinces of the Drama, ch. ii. p. 201.

" le plus bas degré de l'echelle, opposé au terrible qui est à l'autre bout." The Bourgeois Gentilhomme of Molicre is certainly farce, however excellent in its way. But Mons. Jourdain is a very Ulysses, compared with Margites.

N O T E 29.

P. 72. By such successive improvements as were most obvious.

' Oσον εγινετο φανερον αυτης—literally, " so much of it as was "manifest."—I doubt of the reading: but, taking it as it stands, I have given what appears to me to offer itself as the most natural and simple meaning of the expression, if not the only one that it will reasonably bear.

N O T E 30.

P. 72. ÆSCHYLUS----ABRIDGED THE CHORAL PART.

The words are, TA τε χορε. Aristotle would hardly have expressed himself thus, had he meant, as Madius, Bayle, and others, have understood, a retrenchment in the number of choral performers. TA τε χορε, the choral part, is opposed to TA ἀπο σεργης, the dialogue, Prob. xv. of Sect. 19. It is singular, that Stanley should misunderstand this passage; and still more singular, that he should cite Philostratus, who is directly against him: for his words are, συνεςειλε τες χορες, ΑΠΟΤΑΔΗΝ ΟΝΤΑΣ: "be contracted the chorusses, which were immoderately long."

b Fontenelle, Preface to his Comedies, vol. vii. of his works.

a Stanl. in vit. Æschyli, Ed. Pauw, p. 706.

This is confirmed by one of Aristotle's Problems, referred to by Victorius. The Problem is, Δια τι δι περι Φρυνιχον ήσαν μαλλον μελοποιοι; (meaning, I suppose, more Musicians than the dramatic Poets of his own time:) The answer is, η, δια το πολλαπλασια είναι τοτε τα μελη εν ταις των μετρων τραγωδιαις;—I believe the passage may be rectified by transposition—πολλ. είναι τοτε τα μελη των μετρων εν τ. Τ. Perhaps, too, we should read, των ΤΡΙΜΕΤΡΩΝ. But, even taking it as it stands, it may sufficiently answer our purpose, as it shews clearly enough how much the Lyric parts of Tragedy, before the time of Æschylus, wanted contraction.

The prolixity of the Tragic Chorus, we know, was sometimes trying to the patience of an Athenian audience. This is pleafantly glanced at by Aristophanes in his Opvides: where the Chorus of birds, descanting on the convenience of wings, tell the spectators, that if they had wings, whenever, in the Theatre, they "found" themselves hungry, and were tired with the Tragic Chorus, they "might sly home and eat their dinners, and sly back again, when "the Chorus was over."

ΧΟΡ. Ουδεν ες αμεινον, εδ' ήδιον, ή φυσαι πτερα.
Αυτιχ', ύμων των θεατων ει τις ήν ύποπτερω,
Ειτα, πεινων, τοις χοροισι των Τραγωδων ήχθετο,
Εκπετομενω αν έτω ήριςησεν, έλθων δικαδε,
Κατ' αν, εμπλησθεις, εφ ήμας αυθις αυ κατεπτατο. υ. 786.

N O T E 31.

P. 72. AND MADE THE DIALOGUE THE PRINCIPAL PART OF TRAGEDY.

— Και τον λογον πρωταγωνισην παρεσπευασε.—Victorius, and others, have supposed Aristotle to mean the Prologue. But it seems to be a fufficient

b Sell. 19. Prob. xxxi.

a fufficient objection to this fenfe, that no example has been produced of the word πρωταγωνικης, used as merely synonymous to TOWT : as fignifying first only, not principal. Nor is it only to discover any reason, why Aristotle should have recourse here to an unufual and ambiguous expression, when, presently after, in speaking of the improvements of Comedy [cap. v.], he makes use of the proper and established term, προλογ. There seem to be no words in the Greek language, of which the fense is more clearly fixed, than that of πρωταγωνισης—πρωταγωνισειν. They occur frequently, and always, as far as I know, in the fame fense, of principal—primas agere, &c. To this fense, therefore, I thought it necessary to adhere. But I confess I cannot be fatisfied with either of the explanations which have been given of the word ΛΟΓΟΣ. It appears strange to say, that Æschylus first introduced two actors, and then to add, as a distinct improvement, that he also first introduced a principal part or character:—unless we are to understand, what seems not very probable, that the two actors even of Æschylus himself were, at sirst, personages of equal dignity and importance in the drama, like the two kings of Brentford in the Rehearfal; and that, afterwards, he was the first who corrected this error, (in which he would probably have been followed by other Poets,) and reduced the drama to unity of action by a proper subordination of characters. But, admitting this sense to be without difficulty, the expression of it, I think, is not. Acros. for a part in the drama, rôle, personnage, (as Dacier,) character, &c. feems harsh, and unusual. At least, I know no example of it.

The difficulties which attend both the expression and the sense, in each of these interpretations, have almost convinced me, that the very construction of the words has been mistaken; and that the meaning is, "he made the discourse, or dialogue, the principal part" of Tragedy." This is well connected with what precedes, and agreeable to the known history of the Tragic drama, in which, originally, the Chorus was the essential, and the Episodes, or dramatic matic part, only the acceffory. But Æschylus "abridged the " Chorus, and made the Episodic part the principal." Aoy , here, may well be understood to mean what Aristotle elsewhere calls λεξις; the speaking, or recitative, part of Tragedy, whether delivered by one or more actors, as opposed to the μελη, or Lyric part. Hapsonsvass, reddidit, effecit, &cc. as, (to take the first instance of this common use of that verb which the Lexicons offer me) -- ευσεβεςερες τε και σωτρονεςερες τες συνοντας παρεσκευασεν-- "magis pios " et temperatos reddidit"." And thus Aristotle himself, cap. xix. όταν η έλεεινα η δεινα - δεη παρασκευαζων. i. e. to make things piteous, terrible, &c. as in Goulston's vertion; and that of the accurate Piccolomini:-" Quando occorre d'havere à far parere le cose, ò " miserabili, o atroci," &c .- If the use of mewraywishs as an adjective be an objection, it is one to which the other explanations are equally liable. On the whole, I have not ferupled to prefer this fense in my version'.

N O T E 32.

P. 72. SOPHOCLES-----ADDED THE DECORATION OF PAINTED SCENERY.

To adjust exactly the rival claims of Æschylus and Sophocles with respect to the Ohs, or decoration, of the Tragic stage, would be a desperate undertaking. Some accounts are so liberal to Æschylus, as scarce to leave his successors any room for farther improvements. They give him "paintings, machinery, altars, tombs, "trumpets, ghosts, and furies:"—to which others add a very sin-

^{*} See NOTE 90.

 $^{^{}b}$ Xenophon. So Hocrates, Π agashevaζε σεαντον πλεουεμτειν μεν δυναμένον, &c. Ad Demonicum.

^c Since this note was written, the fame explanation has been given, and well supported, in the Camb. edit. of 1785. Præl. p. xxxi. &c.

gular species of Tragic improvement, the "exhibition of drunken "men."—την δε σκηνην εκοσμησε, και την όψων των θεωμενων κατεπληξε τη λαμπροτητι—ΓΡΑΦΑΙΣ και μηχανωις, βωμοις τε και ταφοις, σαλπιγξων, είδωλοις, έρωνωσε.—ΜS. life of Æschylus, quoted by Stanley, In vitam Æschyli, and by Fabric. Bib. Gr. lib. ii. cap. xvi. Sect. 2.— And Athenceus says, πρωτω έκεινω——παρηγαγε την των ΜΕΘΥΟΝ-ΤΩΝ ΟΨΙΝ ε΄ς τραγωδιαν. p. 428.—He adds an example. In the Tragedy called Καβαροι, he introduced " Jason and his retinue" drunk!"

The passage given by Dacier from Vitruvius is very general; it says only, "fcenam fecit"." This may, or may not, include painting; which, indeed, rather seems to be implied, in what follows, about the improvements of Democritus and Anaxagoras, where the "imagines ædificiorum in fcenarum picturis" are mentioned. But all this is far outweighed by the testimony of Aristotle, who here explicitly attributes the introduction of painted fcenery to Sophocles.

N O T E 33.

P. 72. IT WAS LATE BEFORE TRAGEDY----ATTAINED ITS PROPER DIGNITY.

—Οψε ἀπεσεμνωθη:—and to "late," we might add, imperfectly. For, what Horace fays of the Roman Tragedy, is, in fome meafure, though perhaps not equally, applicable to the Greek:

in longum tamen ævum Manserunt, hodieque manent vestigia ruris.

Ep. ad Aug. v. 160.

² Primus Agatharcus Athenis, Æschylo docente Tragædiam, scenam secit. Vitruv. Praf. in lib. vii.

Prejudice

Prejudice ande, it cannot furely be faid, that the Greek Tragedy, in the hands, at least, of Æschylus, Sophocles, or Euripides, ever attained its proper dignity. I do not speak of modern dignity; of that uniform, unremitting strut of pomp and solemnity, which is now required in Tragedy. This was equally unknown to the manners, and to the Poetry, of the antients. I fpeak only of fuch a degree of dignity as excludes, not simplicity, but meanness—the familiar, the jocofe, the coarfe, the comic. Now it cannot, I think, be faid, with any truth, that these are thoroughle excluded in any of the Greek Tragedies that are extant: in fome of them they are admitted to a very confiderable degree. In particular, fomething of this fort—of what the French call melquin—is almost conflantly to be found in the flort dialogue of the Greek Tragedies; in that part, I mean, which the eye, when we turn over any Tragedy, easily distinguishes from the rest, by its being carried on in a regular alternation of fingle verses. In this "close fighting" of the dialogue, as Dryden calls it b, which feems to have retained fomething of the spirit of the old satyric diverbia, where, in the origin of the Greek, as well as of the Roman drama, Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fundant, Hor.

—in this part of the dialogue, we generally find, mixed indeed frequently with fine strokes of nature and feeling, somewhat more than what Brumoy calls "un petit vernis de familiarité;" especially when these scenes are, as they often are, scenes of altercation and angry repartee. In the Iphigenia in Aulide of Euripides, Menelaus, in the struggle with the old messenger for the letter, threatens to break his bead with his sceptre, Σκηπτρώ ταχ' άρα σον καθαιμαζω καρα. υ. 311.

^{*} A fensible writer has justly remarked the ill effect of this symmetrical fort of conversation upon the illusion of the drama. [Letters on various subjects, by Mr. Jackson of Exeter, vol. ii. p. 109.] The English reader may see an example of it in Milton's Comus, v. 277—290.

[·] Effay on Dram. Pocfy.

⁻ Theatre des Grees, tome iii. p. 205.

Fairly rendered by Mr. Potter's verse-

" Soon shall thy head this sceptre stain with blood."

Unfairly dignified by Brumoy's pro/e-

"Prends garde qu'une mort prompte ne punisse ton audace."

Even Sophocles, who gave the Tragic tone, in general, its proper pitch, between the δγκω of Æschylus, and the δσχνοτης of Euripides does not means free from some mixture of this allog in the language of his short dialogue. For example: in the scene between Ulysses and Neoptolemus in the Philostetes, [v. 1250,] when Neoptolemus declares his resolution of restoring to Philostetes his bow and arrows, at which Ulysses expresses his surprise by a repetition of the question, Τι φης; —τω ειφηκώς λογου; — Neoptolemus replies, "Would you have me tell you the same thing two or three times over?"

Δις τ'αυτα βελει και τρις ἀναπολειν μ' έπη°; V. 1267.

In another scene of this Poet, between Teucer and Menelaus, after a long altercation about the interment of Ajax, Menelaus says—

Έν σο: φρασω--τουδ' ές ειν έχε βαπτεον.

-to which Teucer replies-

Συ δ' αντακεσον τετον ώς τεθαψεται...

In plain English, but no plainer than the Greek—" M. One thing I'll tell you—he shall not be buried. T. And I'll tell another thing—he shall be buried."—Certainly this approaches

Aristophanes, in The Frogs, makes Euripides boast to Æschylus—

- ώς παρελαβου την τεχνην παρα σα το πρωτου ευθυς Οιδισαν ύπο κομπασματων και έηματων έπαχθων ΙΣΧΝΑΝΑ μεν πρωτισον άυτην, και το βας & άρειλον. V. 490.

* The reader may also see something of the same cast in the scene between Oedipus and Creon, Oed. Tyr. v. 550, &c. And in that between Oedipus and the two Shepherds, v. 1162, &c.—These scenes of snarling altercation, I suppose, were what gave occasion to the ridiculous idea of some Comic Poet, that "Sophocles seemed to have been assisted, in writing his Tragedies, by a mastiff-dog."

Κυων τις έδοκει συμποιειν Μολοττικ . Diog. Laert. IV. 20.

^{*} Ajax, v. 159, 160.

very nearly to the language of a contest between two washer-women.

These may be reckoned among the passages, in which the spirit of Sophocles, according to the observation of a great critic, σβενουται αλογως πολλακις, και πιπτει απυχεςατα. [Longin. Scot. 33.]

In the Antigone there is a scene of altercation between Creon, Ismene, and Antigone, in which, when Ismene, pleading for her lister, asks Creon whether he will put ber to death, who was to become the wife of his son, his answer is—

ΑΡΩΣΙΜΟΙ γαρ χάτερων είσιν ΓΥΑΙ^ε.

The prejudiced admirers of the antients are very angry at the least infimuation that they had any idea of our barbarous Tragi-Comedy. But after all, it cannot be diffembled, that, if they had not the name, they had the thing, or fomething very nearly approaching to it. If that be Tragi-Comedy, which is partly serious and partly comical, I do not know why we should scruple to say, that the Alcestis of Euripides is, to all intents and purposes, a Tragi-Comedy. I have not the least doubt, that it had upon an Athenian audience the proper effect of Tragi-Comedy; that is, that in some places it made them cry, and in others, laugh. And the best thing we have to hope, for the credit of Euripides, is, that he intended to produce this effect. For though he may be an unskilful Poet, who purposes to write a Tragi-Comedy, he surely is a more unskilful Poet, who writes one without knowing it.

The learned reader will understand me to allude particularly to the scene, in which the domestic describes the behaviour of Hercules; and to the speech of Hercules himself, which follows. Nothing can well be of a more comic cast than the servant's complaint. He describes the hero as the most greedy and ill-mannered h Alcestis, v. 757, &c.

Egyptian fugitives to King Plammeticus.—Herod. Euterp. p. 63. ed. H. Steph.

^{*} Hercules was renowned for his allingaria. The following extravagant deferip-mannered guest he had ever attended, under his master's hospitable roof; calling about him, eating, drinking, and finging, in a room by bimself, while the master and all the samily were in the height of funereal lamentation. He was not contented with such restrictionents as had been set before him;

Then he drinks

Έως έθερμην ἀυτον ἀμφιβασα φλοξ Ουκ:

—crowns himself with myrtle, and sings, AMOYΣ' ΥΛΑΚΤΩΝ—and all this, alone. "Cette description," says Fontenelle, "cit is burlesque, qu'on diroit d'un crocheteur qui est de confrairie." A censure somewhat justified by Euripides himself, who makes the servant take Hercules for a thief:

- πανεργον ΚΛΩΠΑ και ΛΗΙΣΤΗΝ τινα.

The speech of Hercules, $\varphi_i \lambda_0 \sigma_0 \varphi_{ev} \tau \otimes iv \mu_e \theta_{ij}$, as the scholiast observes, (v. 776,) "philosophizing in his cups," is still more curious. It is, indeed, full of the $\varphi_i \lambda_0 \xi$ owe, and completely justifies the attendant's description. Nothing can be more jolly. It is in the true spirit of a modern drinking song; recommending it to the servant to uncloud his brow, enjoy the present hour, think nothing of the morrow, and drown his cares in love and wine:

tion of his eating, preferved by Athenæus from the Bufiris, a fatyric drama of Epiacharmus, affords a curious specimen of the satyric fun.

Athen, lib, x, init.

B Oeuvres de Font. vel. ix. p. 415.

OUTO Σ^k — τ , σεμνον και πεφροντικ $\mathfrak S$ βλεπας; Ου χρη σκυθρωπον, κ. τ . αλ.

ΔΕΥΡ' ΈΛΘ', όπως ἀν και σοφωτερω γενη.
Τα θνητα πραγματ' διδας ἡν έχει φυσιν;
ΟΙΜΑΙ μεν ΟΥ ΠΟΘΕΝ ΓΑΡ;—ἀλλ' ἀκεε με.
Βροτοις ἀπασι κατθανειν ἐφειλεται,
Κ'εκ έςι θνητων όςις έξεπιςαται
Την ἀυριον μελλεσαν ἐι βιωσεται.

Ευφραίνε σαυτον' ΠΙΝΕ!—τον καθ ήμεραν
Βιον λογίζε σον, τα δ' άλλα, της τυχης.
Τιμα δε και την πλειστον ήδιςην θεων
ΚΥΠΡΙΝ βροτοισίν—κ. τ. λ. υ. 783—812.

If any man can read this, without supposing it to have set the audience in a roar, I certainly cannot demonstrate that he is mistaken. I can only say, that I think he must be a very grave man himself, and must forget that the Athenians were not a very grave people. The zeal of Pere Brumoy in defending this Tragedy, betrays him into a little indiscretion. He says, "tout cela à sait penser à quelques critiques modernes que cette piece etoit une Tragicomedie; chimere inconnu aux anciens. Cette piece sell du gout des autres Tragedies antiques." Indeed they, who call this play a Tragi-Comedy, give it rather a savourable name; for, in the scenes alluded to, it is, in sact, of a lower species than our Tragi-Comedy: it is, rather, burlesque Tragedy; what Demetrius calls reargues mais materials. Much of the comic cast prevails in other scenes; though mixed with those genuine strokes of simple m Hegi Γ₆/2. § 170. — O δε γελως, fays this writer, iχθε⊕ τραγωδίας. Neither Eurigides, nor Sophocles, feem to have held this as an inviolable maxim.

E "Yeu, fellow!"-Mr. Potter's translation.

¹ Tome iii. f. 206.

and univerfal nature, which abound in this Poet, and which I should be forry to exchange for that monotonous and unaffecting level of Tragic dignity, which never falls, and never rifes.

I will only mention one more instance of this Tragi-comic mixture, and that from Sophocles. The dialogue between Minerva and Ulysses, in the first scene of the Ajax, from v. 74 to 88; is perfectly ludicrous. The cowardice of Ulysses is almost as comic as the cowardice of Falstass. In spite of the presence of Minerva, and her previous assurance, that she would effectually guard him from all danger by rendering him invisible, when she calls Ajax out, Ulysses, in the utmost trepidation, exclaims—Τι δρας, Αθανα; μηδαμως σφ' έξω καλει".

Minerva answers-

Ου σιγ' ἀνεξη, μηδε δειλιαν ἀρεις°;

But Ulysses cannot conquer his fears:-

ΜΗ, ΠΡΟΣ ΘΕΩΝ-άλλ' ενδον άφκειτω μενων .

And in this tone the conversation continues; till, upon Minerva's repeating her promise that Ajax should not see him, he consents to stay; but in a line of most comical reluctance, and with an aside, that is in the true spirit of Sancho Pança:—

Μενοιμ' αν ΗΘΕΛΟΝ Δ' ΑΝ ΕΚΤΟΣ ΩΝ ΤΥΧΕΙΝ .

No unprejudiced person, I think, can read this scene without being convinced, not only, that it must have actually produced, but that it must have been intended to produce, the effect of Comedy.

It appears, indeed, to me, that we may plainly trace in the Greck Tragedy, with all its improvements, and all its beauties, pretty frong marks of its popular and Tragi-comic origin. For, Tea-

^{*} v. 74. -- Anglice, "What are you about, Winerva? -- by no means call him out."

[&]quot; Will you not be filent, and lay afide your fears!"

p "Don't call him out, for heaven's fake:-let him flay within."

q "I'll stay-(aside) but I wish I was not here."—" J'avoue," sus Brumoy, que ce trait n'est pas à la louange d'Ulysse, ni de Sophocle." (Tome iii.)

and when, afterwards, the indicrous was separated from the serious, and distinguished by its appropriated name of Comedy, the separation seems to have been impersectly made, and Tragedy, distinctively so called, seems still to have retained a tincture of its original merriment. Nor will this appear strange, if we consider the popular nature of the Greek spectacles. The people, it is probable, would still require, even in the midst of their Tragic emotion, a little dash of their old satyric fun, and Poets were obliged to comply, in some degree, with their taste.

When we speak of the Greek Tragedies as correct and perfect models, we seem merely to conform to the established language of prejudice, and content ourselves with echoing, without reslection or examination, what has been said before us. Lord Shaftsbury, for example, talks of Tragedy's being "raised to its height by "Sophocles and Euripides, and no room left for further excellence" or emulation." Advice to an Author, Part II. Seet. 2. where the reader may also see his unwarrantable and absurd interpretation of Aristotle's phrase, eage try eagen, by which he makes the philosopher "declare, that whatever idea might be formed of "the utmost perfection of the kind of Poem, it could, in practice, "rise no higher than it had been already carried in his time." I should be forry to be ranked in the class of those critics, who r C. saub. De Sat. Poess, p. 21, 22.—Constat sand primis temporibus ignoratum suisse discrimen inter Tragordiam et Comordiam:----nam et Τρυγωδία et Τραγωδία, primitùs nomen suit commune, quod posted διεσπασθε, ut ait Aristoteles, et veteres critici testantur. Idem: [sc. Athonaus] τραγωδία, το παλαιο, έν δυρία κουνο και προς την Κωμφδίων ίσερον δε, το μεν κοινον όνομα έσχεν ή Τραγωδία ή δε Κωμφδία, ίδιον.

^{* &}quot;Scenical representations, being then intended, not, as in our days, for the "entertainment of the better fort, but on certain great solemnities, indifferently for the diversion of the whole city, it became necessary to consult the taste of the multi"tude, as well as of those, "quibus est equus, et pater, et res." Notes on Hor. vol. i. p. 93. See also p. 195.—Plato calls Tragedy, της ποιησεως ΔΗΜΟΤΕΡΠΕΣΤΑΤΟΝ τε και ψυχαγαγικωτατο. Min. vol. ii. p. 321. Serr.

prefer that Poetry which has the fewest faults, to that which has the greatest beautiest. I mean only to combat that conventional and bearfay kind of praife, which has fo often held out the Tragedies of the Greek Poets, as elaborate and perfect models, such as had received the last polish of art and meditation. praise of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, is, (in kind at least, though not in degree,) the praise of Shakspeare; that of strong, but irregular, unequal, and hafty genius. Every thing, which this genius and the feeling of the moment could produce, in an early period of the art, before time, and long experience, and criticism, had cultivated and refined it, these writers possess in great abundance: what meditation, and "the labour and delay of the pile" only can effect, they too often want. Of Shakspeare, however, compared with the Greek Poets, it may justly, I think, be pronounced, that he has much more, both of this want, and of that abundance.

N O T E 34-

P. 72. ORIGINALLY, THE TROCHAIC TETRAMETER WAS MADE USE OF, &c.

As the Trochaic measure was still occasionally admitted, even in the improved and serious Greek Tragedy, and, in particular, occurs very frequently in the Tragedies of Euripides, it is natural to suppose, that a still more frequent use of it would be one of the characteristics of the satyric drama, which seems to have been only a fort of revival, in an improved and regular form, of the old Trochaic Tragedy^a with its chorus of dancing fatyrs^b. It feems therefore fomewhat remarkable, though I have not feen it noticed, that in the only fatyric drama extant, the Cyclops, and that written by Euripides, who has made so much use of this measure in his Tragedies, not a single Trochaic tetrameter is to be found.

^{*} Ποτερου ποτε αρειττου ἐυ ποιημασι και λογοις — μεγεθ Ευ ἐυοις διημαςτημενου, ἡ, το συμμετρου μευ ἐυ τοις καιτοςθωμασιν, ὑγιες δε παυτη και ἀδιαπτωτοι. Long. Seet. 33. The ὑγιες παυτη και ἀδιαπτωτου is, furely, by no means the character of the Greek Trageodians. They who think it worth fearching for must lay aside Sophocles, and Shakspeare. In the French Theatre, perhaps, they may find it; but they must be content, I fear, to take with it, the συμμετρου ἐν τος κατοςθωρασι.

N O T E 35.

P. 73. THE IAMBIC IS, OF ALL METRES, THE MOST COLLOQUIAL, &c.

Compare Rhet. lib. iii. cap. i. and cap. viii. Ed. Duval. And Demet. Heq. Equ. Sect. 43.

N O T E 36.

P. 73. ---- SELDOM INTO HEXAMETER, AND ONLY WHEN WE DEPART FROM THE USUAL MELODY OF SPEECH.

It has been thought strange, that Aristotle should introduce here the mention of bexameters, when he has been speaking only of Trochaic and Iambic verse, and is accounting for the adoption of the latter, in preference, not to the bexameter, but to the Trochaic tetrameter: and it has, therefore, been doubted, whether we should not read τετραμετρα. But the established reading, I believe, is right. The Trochaic tetrameter, Aristotle has, both here, and in his Rhetoric, characterized as σατυρικου—τροχερου—ορχηςικωτερου—

^a Aristotle's expression on this subject this where, is, δι τας ΤΡΑΓΩι Δ IAΣ ποιεντές ------ ἐκ των τετραμμετρων ἐις το λαμβείον μετεβηταν, &c. Rhet. iii. 1.

b See Cafaub. de Sat. Porf. lib. i. c. 3.

^{*} Ed. Ox. 1780, p. 277.

and even nepolannutegov. He did not, I apprehend, confider it as being, in any degree, ACRTIMOV. It was therefore entirely out of the question, when a metre proper for the general dialogue of Tragedy was to be fought for: but the benameter was not fo; and it might, without abfurdity, be asked by an objector, as Castelvetro and Piccolomini have observed, why that species of verte was not adopted; especially as the Tragic Poets were the successors of the Epic, or Heroic', and Homer, according to Plato, was "the first " of Tragic Poets". As its character was grave and flately, it might feem, on that account, well adapted to Tragedy, where, indeed, we actually find it occasionally introduced. But Aristotle objects to it as less proper, because, though σεμνον, it was at the same time, & Dentinove. He allows, however, that it was not be remote from the rhythm of common speech, but that it might be casually produced, like the Iambic, though it rarely happened. He even goes fo far, as to allow, in his concluding chapter, that Tragedy " might adopt the Epic metre"."—All this feems to afford furficient fupport to the common reading. The Heroic and Jambie feet are, in the same manner, considered together, Rhet. iii. S.

- b See above, NOTE 8. and c.
- c άντι των έπων, τραγωδοδιδασμαλοι. ch. iv. Transl. Part I. Sect. 6.
- α πεωτον των τεαγωδιοποιων. Repub. lib. x. p. 607.
- e Rhet. iii. 8.
- f See Quintil. lib. ix. ch. 4.—The most singular instance of involuntary versist-cation that I ever met with, is to be found, where no one would expect to find such a thing,—in Dr. Smith's System of Optics. The 47th Sect. of ch. ii. book i. begins thus:—
 - " When parallel rays
 - " Come contrary ways
 - " And fall upon opposite sides"

If, as Quintilian fays, "Versum in oratione fieri, multò fædissimum est, totum; sicut "etiam in parte, deforme"—what would be have said to balf an Anapæstic sanza, in rhime, produced in a mathematical book, the author of which, too, was supposed to have possessed an uncommon delicacy of ear?

^{* -} τω μετρφ [sc. της εποποιιας] εξες: χρησθαι. Cap. ult.

By λεκτικη άρμονια, Aristotle means what Aristoxenus calls ΜΕΛΟΣ λογωδες^h. We must not suppose him to use the word άρμονια here, in that lax and general sense, in which we commonly apply it to the rhythm of speech, when we talk of the harmony of a verse or a period. He speaks with his usual accuracy. Speech, as well as Music, has its melody and its rhythm; and these, in speech animated by passion, are so modified, as to approach, more or less perceptibly, to musical melody and rhythm. And what Aristotle here asserts, I think, is, that the Greeks seldom, or never, departed so far from the usual rhythm of speech, as to run into hexameter verse, except when they were led, by the same cause, to depart equally from its usual melody or tones.

N O T E 37~

P. 73. THE EPISODES WERE MULTIPLIED.

The mistakes, into which some commentators have been led by annexing to the term Emerodico, as applied by Aristotle to Tragedy, the modern and Epic idea of a digression, "bors-d'œuvre, intermede, "morceau d'attache", have been well pointed out by Le Bossu, Tr. du Poeme Ep. liv. ii. ch. iv. v. vi. ". But he appears to me to have gone too far, and to have fallen into the opposite error, by extending the word even to the most essential parts of the general action, to which he will not allow the emerodica to be, in any sense, added, united, &c.—but insists that they constitute that action, h Harmon. lib. i. p. 18. Ed. Meib.—Αρμονια, here, is equivalent to μελ. . as chap. i. iv. vi. &c.

i See Dist. II. p. 51, and note x.

a Batteux's note on this passage.

b The Abbé D'Aubignac had led the way, in his Pratique du Theatre, liv. iii. ch. i.

" comme les membres font la matiere des corps'." With this idea, he had, indeed, some reason to call the word emerodion, "terme trompeur;" for, in this application of it, all fight of its etymological fense is lost. By all that I can gather from an attentive comparison of all the passages in which Aristotle uses the word, there appears to me no reason to suppose, that he any where meant to apply it indifcriminately to all the incidents of a fable; and it is for this reason that I have no where ventured to render it by the word incident, which would have been too general. Le Bossu's definition is,-" Les Episodes sont les parties necessaires de l'action " etendues avec des circonstances vraisemblables."—The death of Cato, for example, in the Tragedy of Addison, answers to this definition, But would Aristotle have called that an Episade? I can scarce think it. The most I can conceive is, that he might have applied the term ἐπασοδία to the particular circumstances and detail of the action, which were the additions of the Poet's fancy. Le Bossu mentions, as an instance, the escape of Orestes by means of the ablution, in the Iphig. in Taur. of Euripides; which, he fays, Aristotle calls an Episode . But, it is not the escape of Orestes, (ή σωτηρια) that Aristotle so denominates; this was an effential circumstance, and is expressly included by him in that general sketch of the plot, into which the ἐπεισοδια were afterwards to be worked: and one of these Episodes was the detail of the manner in which the escape was effected, δια της καθαρσεως.—See NOTE 143.

The word enerodies is, I think, used by Aristotle only in two senses: 1. The technical sense, in which it is clearly defined to mean, all that part, or, rather, those parts, of a Tragedy, that are included between entire choral odes. 2. It is evidently applied, in c Chap. vi.

d For the incidents in general, without distinction of essential or episodic, Aristotle's word seems to be μερη—parts of the action. So, ch. viii, and xxiv.

[·] Ch. xvii .- Tranfl. Part II. Sea. 17.

f .Ch. xii.—Transl. Part II. Sect. 10.

other passages, to the particular parts, subordinate actions, circumstances, or incidents, of the sable; but only, I think, to such, as were not essential parts of the Poet's plan or story, though they might be, and indeed ought to be, closely connected with it:—such, as, however important in the action, by contributing to promote the catastrophe, were yet no way necessitated by history, or popular tradition, or, in subjects of pure invention, by the Poet's general and determined plan, but depended on the invention or the choice of the Poet, who might, without any alteration in the nabore roys, as Aristotle calls it, of his drama, have conducted the action to its catastrophe by different means.

The word intervalow, then, appears to me never to be used by Aristotle but in its proper and derivative sense, of something more or less adventitious or accessory—something inserted, superadded, introduced, at pleasure, by the Poet. But the Epic Poem, from its extent of plan, and the variety requisite to its purpose, admits, and requires, subordinate actions of greater length and slighter relation to the principal action of the sable, than is consistent with the shorter compass, closer unity, and different end, of Tragedy. As the Episales of Epic Poetry, therefore, had more distinctness, entirencys, and projection from the subject, if I may so express myself, than those of Tragedy, this, as it was the most obvious, became in time almost the only, application of the term; till, at length, from the frequent abuse of this Epic privilege of variety,

This diffinction is very well illustrated by Le Bossu, liv. ii. ch. v. "Mais, s'il a ctoit necessaire," &c.—to the end. But, in other respects, this chapter is embrou-live. He consounds (as the reader will see by his marginal quotations) descent, proper, natural, connected, &c. with the marginal to the flory, &c. He consounds an Episale with an effection episoded, i. e. extended and filled up by episodic or invented circumstances.

h En le τας έπιξεκανος [Νιροις], δει του πορου ΕΠΕΙΣΟΔΙΟΥΝ επαιίσις, διου Ισουρατής τουν άπι γας την ΕΙΣΑΓΕΙ. Rb.t. iii. cap. xvii. p. 605. Duval.

> we be - good from injuring in non instrome. ch. alt.

and the μεταβαλλειν τον ακκοντα^k, scarce any other idea was annexed to the word Episode, than that of digression, hors-d'æuvre, something foreign to the subject, or connected with it only by the flightest thread. Hence, too, in modern language, the word, I think, is applied only to entire actions of this additional, or digreffive kind; not to the minuter circumstances or incidents which form the detail of an action. Thus, we call the whole story of Dido, in the Aneid, an Episode; but we should not give that name to any of the incidents by which the death of Turnus (an action effential to the fable,) is circumfiantiated, though equally introduced and supplied by the Poet, and therefore equally, in Aristotle's sense, emagodia. And so much, as to his use of this term, in general. Whether these remarks are well or ill founded, will best appear, when we come to apply them to the particular passages in which the word occurs. In that now before us, it is used, I think, in the second of the two senses I mentioned; and its best comment seems to be another passage, cap. xxiv. [Transl. Part III. Sect. 2.] where the critic observes the advantage which the Epic Poem has in the variety of its Episodes, and assigns the want of that variety, as one common cause of ill success in Tragic writing: - το γαρ ΟΜΟΙΟΝ ταχυ πληρεν εκπιπταν ποια τας τραγφδιας.

N. O T E 38.

P. 73. THE RIDICULOUS — A SPECIES OF TURPITUDE OR DEFORMITY; SINCE IT MAY BE DEFINED, &c.

It has been afferted by some writers of eminence, that Aristotle here speaks, not of what is laughable or ludicrous, in general, but only of the ridiculous, in that particular sense of the word, in which it is distinguished from the merely reside, and implies laughter mixed with disapprobation or contempt. This, however, is certainly not what Aristotle has said; for the word yeardow, which he uses, is as general as possible, and answers exactly to our word laughable. And it is in this general sense, justified, I think, by common usage, that I have used the word vidiculous in my version. For though in a philosophical speculation the distinction abovementioned may be necessary for clearness, and is undoubtedly well founded, yet, in common language, the word vidiculous is never used with this nice appropriation, but applied, like its Latin original, to whatever excites laughter.

But it is objected, that, if Aristotle means the laughable in general, his account of the matter is false; because "men laugh at "that, in which there is neither fault nor turpitude of any "kind"." I answer, that this is true in English, but not true in Greek. Our word, turpitude, is confined, I think, to a moral tenfe, and I suppose is here so used by Dr. Beattie; and it is certainly true, that we laugh at many things that have in them no turpitude of that kind-nothing morally wrong. But the Greek word, AISXPON, was a word of wide extent, and feems manifeffly used here by Aristotle in its utmost latitude; comprehending every thing that is, in any degree, ugly or deformed, from atrocious villainy, the highest moral ugliness, to a ridiculous cast of features in an ugly face. It is the opposite to KAAON, which was used in a correspondent latitude of application.—The objections, which have been made to this passage, have chiefly, I think, been owing to this,—that the objectors have not been fufficiently aware of the extensive signification in which the Greeks used the words, nadov, αισχρον, — άρετη, κακια—σπεδαιον, φαυλου— αμαρτημα, &c.—We translate the words of antient authors by words to which we annex different ideas, and then raise objections and difficulties from our own mistakes. The consequence of taking ἀισχεον here in the restrained sense of moral turpitude, has been, that those writers, who have so taken it, have been obliged to deny, that γελοιον means laughable, because the laughable in general could not truly be defined, "a species of moral turpitude."

² Beattie, On Laughter and Ludicrous composition—ch. i. p. 326.——1 rd Kaims, El. of Criticism, i. ch. vii.

b Dr. Beattie, ibid. p. 332.

It plainly was not Aristotle's design here to enter into an accurate inquiry about the nature of laughter, and the distinction of risible and ridiculous objects. This he had perhaps done, in that part of this mutilated treatife, which related to Comedy, and to which he himself refers in his Rhetoric. His purpose, here, feems to have been, merely to support and explain his account of Comedy; i. e. that it was μιμησις φαυλοτερων, " an imitation of bad 66 characters;" that is, as he immediately limits the fense of the general term φαυλον, — of ridiculous, or laughable, characters. Such, he continues, are properly denominated fauloi, nanoi, bad, &c. because the laughable (yelosov) is one species of the augypov, taken in its most general sense. "But to what species, or class," it was obvious to ask, "does it belong?"—To that class, it is answered, of things ἀισχρα, which are neither destructive nor painful: for these, exciting terror or pity, are the property of Tragedy°. And he afferts, I think, plainly, that the laughable in general, to yellow, i. e. every thing that excites laughter, is άμαρτημα ΤΙ και ἀισχω. ανωδυνον και ε φθαρτικον—is, in some respect or other, faulty, rerong, deformed, but neither painful nor pernicious. What follows, about a ridiculous face, is, I think, clearly, not an illustration merely, as Dr. Campbell understands it to be, but an instance. This feems evident from Aristotle's using the very word aurxeou; (προσωπον αισχρον) which he would hardly have done, had he just $^{^{\}circ}$ — διωρισαι δε περι γελοιών χωρις εν τοις περι ποιητικής. Rhet. i. 11. Ed. Duval. — ειρηται ΠΟΣΑ ΕΙΔΗ ΓΕΛΟΙΩΝ έτιν, εν τοις περι ποιητικής. Ibid. iii. 18.

d See Note 19.—One of the explanations of φαυλ@ in Hestichius is καταγελας.

E See cap. xii. initio .- Transl. Part II. End of Sect. 9.

Philof. of Rhetoric, book i. ch. iii. Sect. 1, before used the words $2i\sigma\chi_{\varphi}$ and $2i\sigma\chi_{\varphi}$, as Dr. Campbell and Dr. Beattie contend that he bas used them, in a moral sense only.

But it is objected—" We can never suppose that Aristotle would "have called distorted seatures " a certain fault or slip"." To call them a slip, would indeed sound strangely; because that expression conveys the idea of something morally wrong. But when we say, that a very long nose, or a wide mouth, is a fault in a sace, we use a very common expression; the word fault having, I think, the same latitude of application as the Greek word apagenpa.

It must be observed, however, that all Aristotle says is, that these two characters, deformity of some fort, and the absence of pain, or burt, are to be found in every object of laughter: he neither fays, nor implies, the converse-that every thing so qualified is laughableh. With respect to one of these characters—the absence of pain or harm—there can be no doubt. It is only faying that we cannot laugh at that which shocks us. As to the other general character, deformity, ugliness, something wrong, &c. (άμαρτημα TI nai ano y (%) it feems to me, that these expressions, taken in that large fense, in which Aristotle plainly means to use them, amount to much the same as those used by modern philosophers to characterize the rifible in general; fuch as, "incongruity, incongruous " affociation, striking unfuitablenessi,"-" disproportion, inconsistence " and dissonance of circumstances in the same object"."-" With re-" spect to works both of nature, and of art," says the ingenious and philosophical author of the Elements of Criticism, "none of _____ fome incongruous form, Some flubborn diffonance of things combin'd.

Pl. of Im. b. iii. v. 250.

^{*} Phil. of Rhet. book i. ch. iii. Sect. 1.

Though every incongruous combination is not ludicrous, every ludicrous combination is incongruous." Dr. Beattie, On Laughter, &c. ch. ii. p. 351.

¹ Phil. of Rhet. ibid. p. 89, 93.

Eattic, On Laughter, from Dr. Gerrard. So Akenside-

[&]quot; them

"them are rifible but what are out of rule, some remarkable desect "or excess; a very long visage, for example, or a very short one. "Hence nothing just, proper, decent, beautiful, proportioned, or "grand, is rifible"." This appears to me to be exactly the meaning, and to approach very near to the language, of Aristotle. For, of whatever may be thus characterized it surely may be said, that it has some species of fault, deformity, or distortion: in Aristotle's words, auagrapa Ti nai dix & — airxgov TI nai ΔΙΕΣΤΡΑΜΜΕΝΟΝ.

Aristotle's account, then, of the yellow, appears to be right, as far as it goes. It might, indeed, be objected to, as too general, had he given it as the result of an exact and particular analysis of the subject. But this, as I have already observed, was not his purpose in this place.

It is farther objected by Dr. Campbell, that to fpeak of laughter in general, "would have been foreign to Aristotle's purpose:" because, "laughter is not his theme, but Comedy; and laughter only so far as Comedy is concerned with it. Now the concern of Comedy reaches no farther than that kind of ridicule which relates to manners."—Undoubtedly it was this kind of ridicule that Aristotle had principally in view. But I apprehend, that the Comedy here in question was concerned with the ridiculous or laughable in general. For Aristotle's notion of Comedy, as an excellent writer has observed, "was taken from the state and practice of the Athenian stage; that is, from the old or middle Comedy, which answers to his description. The great revoulution which the introduction of the new Comedy made in the drama, did not happen till afterwards." Now the old and middle Comedy, as I have before observed?, were no other than m Phil. of Rhet. b. i. ch. iii. fest. 1.

¹ Lord Kaims, El. of Crit. vol. i. ch. vii. Yet he, too, objects to Aristotle's definition, as "obscure and impersect."—Ch. xii.

n Dife. on the Provinces of the Drama, p. 201.

[·] NOTE 28.

what we should call Farce. To raise a laugh was so eminently their object, that the ridiculous (το γελοιον) is frequently used by Plato, as synonymous to Comedy, and substituted for it; as pity is also for Tragedy. Nor was it even very "foreign to Aristotle's "purpose" to instance in a ridiculous face; for that this also was an established source of fun in the Greek theatre, is well known from the curious account of the comic masks in Jul. Pollux; who says, particularly of those of the old Comedy, that they were ridiculous caricaturas of the persons represented:—ἐπι το γελοιοτερον ἐσχηματιςο^α. The Athenians were certainly not more delicate than Cicero, who thought, we know, that bodily deformities were "satis bella materies ad jocandum". He, also, agrees persectly with Aristotle, or rather follows him, in his account of the ridiculous: "Locus autem et regio quasi ridiculi TURPITUDINE ET "DEFORMITATE QUADAM continctur"."

N O T E 39.

P. 73. ITS POETS HAVE BEEN RECORDED.

The original is, of AEFOMENOI auths mountai purposecoutai: the only fair translation of which, I think, is, "they who are called "its Poets." But as it seems not easy to find any reasonable meaning

4

Ρ ᾿Αρ ϶χ, ὁ ἀντ Τον Φ και περι ΤΟΥ ΓΕΛΟΙΟΥ;—meaning Comedy: and prefently after, τἀντον ποιεις ὁπερ ἐν ΤΟΙΣ ΕΛΕΟΙΣ, i. e. in Tragedy. De Rep. lib. x. p. 606. ed. Serr.—See also De Leg. p. 816. where, in perfect agreement with Aristotle, he uses this expression: ὁτα μεν ἐν ΠΕΡΙ ΓΕΛΩΤΑ ἐρι παιγνια, ὰ δη ΚΩΜΩιΔΙΑΝ παιτες λεγομεν—n. τ. ἀλ.

⁴ Lib. iv. cap. xix. And fee Lucian, De Salt. p. 925. ed. Bened. He fays, that the ridiculousness of the comic masks was regarded as a part of the entertainment; μες τε τεςπνε.

[·] De Or. lib. ii. cap. 59.

[.] Ibid. ii. 53, for this, I have not translated the word at all. The text is probably corrupt. Castelvetro conjectured, very ingeniously, 'OAIFOI MEN 'ΟΙ 'ΑΥΤΗΣ ποιηται.—But this Greek, ολιγοι δι ποιηται, is, I fear, what the critics call, πονηφε κομματ. I will venture to mention another conjecture that has occurred to me. The learned reader will dispose of it as he pleases. It seems not improbable that Aristotle wrote, Ηδη δε σχηματα τινα αυτης έχεσης ΌΙΛ ΛΕΓΟΜΕΝ, 'OI aurns, &c. i. e. "When it had acquired a certain form, fuch " as we fay," alluding to what he had faid of Homer's suggesting, by his Margites, the true form, or idea, of Comedy, in which the ridiculous was substituted for the mere invective of the old Iambic, or Satyric forma. Τα της πωμωδίας ΣΧΗΜΑΤΑ πρωτώ ύπεδείζεν, ε ψογου, άλλα ΤΟ ΓΕΛΟΙΟΝ δραματοποιησας, [cap. iv.] See, also, what he fays immediately after, of the forms (σχηματα) of Tragedy and Comedy being errupatepa, in higher credit and esteem, than those of the old fatirical and encomiastic poems which preceded them: for this feems to accord with what he here fays, that Comedy was neglected till it attained fomething of this its proper form, and aimed at its proper object, the ridiculous. The reader will fee the connection: Ἡ δε κωμωδια, δια το ΜΗ ΣΠΟΥΔΑΖΕΣΘΑΙ έξ άρχης, έλαθε:.. ---- ΗΔΗ ΔΕ ΣΧΗΜΑΤΑ τινα αυτης έχεσης 'ΟΙΑ ΛΕΓΟΜΕΝ, 'ΟΙ αυτης ποιηται μνημονευονται.—This differs from the prefent reading only by the infertion of a fingle letter, A, which might eafily have been omitted, from its resemblance to the A that follows,

N O T E 40.

P. 73. PROLOGUES.

We are not, I think, to look for a fense of the word Hodor &, as here applied to Comedy, different from that, in which it is applied, ch. xii. [Transl. Part II. Sect. 10.] to Tragedy. In both, it a - The lamigues ideas.

was that introductory part of the drama, the business of which was, to give the spectator, either directly, in its very outset, or, more obliquely, in the course of it, so much information relative to the subject of the piece, as would enable him to follow the action without confusion2. This we learn clearly from the following passage in that part of Aristotle's Rhetoric, where he explains and illustrates the oratorical exordium, by a comparison of it with that of the Epic Poem, and with the prologue of a drama. After giving, as examples, the openings of the Iliad and Odyffey, he goes οη, και οι Τραγικοι δηλεσι περι το δραμα, κάν μη ευθυς, ώσπερ Ευριπιδης, 'H KOMO $\iota\Delta$ IA 'OSATTOS".—This clearly excludes the feparate prologue, fuch as that of the Roman Comedy; and it is, also, irreconcilable with Dacier's idea, that by the prologue, in the passage we are confidering, Aristotle meant what was afterwards called the Parabasis; for this was merely an address from the Poet to the audience, through the mouth of the Chorus, occurring indifferently in any part of the play, and even, fometimes, at the end of it'. It feems to differ from the prologue of the Roman Comedy, and of the modern drama, only in its being delivered by the Chorus, and in the body of the pieced.

[&]quot; This purpose is well expressed in the Rhet. lib. iii. cap. 14. — ο δες άσπες εις την χιζε την άγχην, πειει έχρμενον άκολεθειν τφ λογφ.

Bhet. iii. 14. The inftance there given from Sophocles, Έμοι πατης ἡν ΠολυβΦ, neems an interpolation; for those words are not in any part of the προλογΦ of the Occlipus Tyr. even according to Aristotle's own definition of the word, cap. xii.— The fense too seems better without it; for he means, I think, to say, that it was the general practice of Sophocles to convey this information more indirectly, and somewhere in the Prologue, as it was the general practice of Euripides to do this prosessed, and in the very opening.

As in the Εκιώνισ, of Ariflophanes, which closes with the Παραβασις.—See Suidas, v. παραβ. and Jul. Pollux.

⁴ See the Parabasis of the Nubes, v. 518, which, its indecency excepted, is much of the same east with the Prologues of Terence.

Tracedy, according to the usual account of it, seems to have confifted, at first, only of two parts, the Xopinov, and Emeroofiov, and to have begun and ended with those choral fongs, which were then esteemed the essential part of Tragedy. But, afterwards, these feanty fables, purpos pulos, as Aristotle calls them, were drawn out to their proper fize, not only by introducing a greater variety of episodic incidents2, but by prefixing to the first choral fong, (or to the first speech of the entire chorus, according to Aristotle's account of the Parode, cap. xii.) the introductory part called Προλογ®, and adding, after the last, the concluding part called Ezolos. The eafe was probably the same with Comedy. Phallic fongs, from which it received its birth, were, I suppose, regarded originally as the effential part of the Comic drama, in the fame manner as the Bacchic hymns were of the Tragic. Aristotle plainly speaks of Comedy, as having gradually received similar additions and improvements to those of Tragedy'; and, among these, that of the Προλογ. That fuch an introductory part, or act, which should be, as Aristotle expresses it, δαγμα λογε, and έδοποιησις τω ἐπ. οντι k, was indeed still more necessary to Comedy than to Tragedy, is obvious from the very nature of the former drama '.

The nature and office of the Greek prologue, and its two different manners, are, I observe, very exactly expressed by Terence in the conclusion of his feparate prologue to the Adelphi; as they are also very well exemplified in the two first scenes.

Dehine,

[°] Cap. xii. Transl. Part II. Sect. 10.

f Cap. iv.

s See Note 37.

h Cap. iv.

i προσωπα – προλογες – ωληθη υπουριτων. – Malks were used in Tragedy also. Æschylus was, "personæ—repertor honestæ," according to Horace.

k Rhet. ubi suprà.

¹ See Note 59, and the passage from Athenœus,

Dehine, ne expectetis argumenta fabulæ. Senes qui primi venient, hi, partem aperient, In agendo partem oftendent.

That is, as I understand it, part of the plot they will open to you in the way of direct narration, like the prologues of Euripides, (as, in the foliloquy of Mitio,) and part they will discover in a more oblique and dramatic way, in the scene of action and dialogue that follows: "In agendo partem oftendent."

I ventured, in a former note*, to fay, that the Greek Tragedy appeared to me to have retained, with all its improvements, some traces of its origin. Something of this may be perceived, I think, in the very opening of many of the Greek dramas: but especially in those of Euripides, whose inartificial prologues of explanatory narration, addressed directly to the spectators, remind us of the state of Tragedy previous to the introduction of the dialogue; when it consisted only of a story told between the acts, (if I may so speak,) of the Dithyrambic Chorus, which was then the main body and substance of the entertainment. When I read the opening of the Hecuba:

ΗΚΩ, νευρων κευθμωνα και σκοτε πυλας Λιπων, τν' Αδης χωρις ώκιςαι θεων, ΠΟΛΥΔΩΡΟΣ, Εκαβης παις γεγως της Κισσεως Πριαμετε πατρ[®]—κ. τ. αλ.[™]——

-that of the Perse of Æschylus:---

ΤΛΔΕ μεν Περσων των διχομενων Ελλαδ' εις αιαν πιςα καλειται.

-or, even the-

ΑΥΤΟΣ ωδ' εληλυθα

Ο ΠΑΣΙ ΚΛΕΙΝΟΣ ΟΙΔΙΠΟΥΣ ΚΑΛΟΥΜΕΝΟΣ---

^{*} Note 33, p. 205.

m Almost all the Tragedies of Euripides open in the same manner. Sec, in particular, Iphig. in Taur. Bacche, and Phanissa.

—of Sophoclesⁿ, I cannot help thinking of the fingle actor of Thespis, announcing his own name and family, and telling the simple tale of his achievements or misfortunes.

This fort of direct explanation was afterwards, with much more propriety, taken from the persons of the drama, and configned to the actors in a detacked prologue, such as those of Plantus and Terence: a practice, which, if we did not know the attachment of Ben Jonson to every thing antient, we might suspect he meant to ridicule, by the pleasant use he has made of it in the prologue to his puppet-shew of Hero and Leander, in the Bartholomew Fair.

- "Gentles, that no longer your expectations may wander,
- "Behold our chief actor, amorous Leander,
- "With a great deal of cloth lapp'd about him like a fearf,
- "For he yet ferves his father, a dyer at Puddle-wharf," &cc.

The next, and the last frep, in the history of Prologues, was again to leave the argument, as it had been left by Sophocles, to the oblique information and gradual development of the action itself, and to make the separate prologue subservient to other purposes, unconnected with the subject of the drama.—The worst of these purposes, and the greatest possible abuse of the term, is to be found in what is called the Prologue of the French Opera; which is wholly composed of two ingredients, almost equally disgusting to a just poetical, or moral taste—allegory and adulation.

n Oed. Tyr. v. 8.—Of all the openings of this Poet, that of the Trachiniæ resembles most the manner of Euripides.

[°] See Rousseau's account of it, Dist. de Mus. art. PROLOGUE.

N O T E 41.

P. 73. EPICHARMUS AND PHORMIS FIRST INVENTED COMIC FABLES.

Dacier, here, raises unnecessary difficulties. His positive aftertion, that, in the old and middle Comedy, "Il n'y avoit rien de "feint," [Notes 10 and 13] is surprising. The slightest inspection of Aristophanes will consute it. Was it, then, a fact, that Socrates used to be suspended in a basket for the benefit of aerial meditation? and that Æschylus and Euripides weighed their verses in a pair of scales, to decide, by that means, a contest or superiority, after they were dead"? &c. Farther, it seems not easy to reconcile this affertion of Dacier's, to what he afterwards says, ch. ix. note 8.

Muθες ποιεν, is clearly to invent plots or fubjects; and whatever is invented, or feigned, is, in Aristotle's language, καθολε, or general, as opposed to a strictly historical plot, which is καθ έκαςον, particular. See ch. ix. which is the best comment on this passage; especially what is there said of Comedy. The expression, therefore, which Aristotle presently after uses, in speaking of Crates, αφεμενω της ιαμβικης ίδεας, καθολε ποιεν λογες η μυθες, I understand to be no more than the development of the sho. ter expression which preceded, μυθες ποιεν. He does not say, that Crates was the first Poet, but only the first Athenian Poet, who invented such comic subjects. The distinction seems clearly marked: το μεν εν εξ άρχης έκ ΣΙΚΕΛΙΑΣ ηλθε: ΤΩΝ ΔΕ ΑΘΗΝΗιΣΙ, Κρατης πρωτω κ. τ. αλλ.

² Nubes, Act I. Sc. III.—Ranæ, Act V. Sc. III.

^{*} Trangl. Part II. Sect. 6.

N O T E 42.

P. 74. EPIC POETRY AGREES SO FAR WITH TRAGIC, &c.

Of the corruption of this paffage I have no doubt. It has been proposed to eject the words, μετα λογε. My suspicion rather falls upon the word µετρε; which, as it adds nothing but embarrassment to the fense, (xoyo, speech, or words, being a general term, and including metre, as in ch. i2,) I have omitted. It appears to me, likewife, that the only meaning, which can reasonably be given to the expression, μεχρι MONOΥ μετρυ, is—" as far as metre alone; "i. e. without confidering the other means of imitation, melody and " rbythm." And, accordingly, some commentators, by μετρου 'ANAOYN, understand verse alone, without music. But had this been Aristotle's meaning, he would probably have used the appropriated and clear word, ψιλου^b. The proper and obvious fense of μετρον άπλεν, is, a fimple, or fingle, kind of metre. This fense feems also supported by what he says of the metrical difference of the Epic and Tragic Poems, cap. xxiv. where melody and rhythm are not taken into the comparison, but the different kinds of metre only, and their being one, or many: - is yas tis in allies τινι μετρω διηγηματικην μιμησιν ποιοιτο, ή εν ΠΟΛΛΟΙΣ, απρεπες αν φαιvoito. And farther, that Aristotle did not mean to express by μετρον άπλεν, the exclusion of melody and rhythm, appears the more probable, because he sufficiently expresses this presently afterwards, when he fays, that some of the parts of Tragedy were peculiar to it. Now these parts are no other than the decoration, (obis), and the Melopæia, which included melody and rhythm.

² See NOTE V. p. 155.

b Ibid.

^c Απιπ-ΜΟΝΟΕΙΔΗΣ-Suidas. Άπιων-ΑΣΥΝΘΕΤΟΝ. Hef. So, άπιων is opposed by Aristotle to πεπιεγμένον, cap. x. et passim: and to διπίων, cap. xiii. & xxi.

On the whole, it feems not improbable, that the passage originally stood in some such way as this: Ἡ μεν ἐν Εποποίια τη Τραγωτία μεχρι μονε ΤΟΥ μετα λογε μιμησιΝ ἐιναι σπεδαιων ἠκολεθησεν.

N O T E 43.

P. 74. This, AT FIRST, WAS EQUALLY THE CASE WITH TRAGEDY ITSELF.

It feems to have been taken for granted, without any foundation, by Dacier, and other commentators, that the modern rule, (for an antient rule it certainly is not,) of what is called the unity of time, was strictly adhered to in every period of the Greek drama: and this has led them, in this passage, to confound the length of the action, or sable, with that of the representation; for these, where a strict unity of time is observed, are indeed the same. But Aristotle here says plainly, that in the earliest state of Tragedy, no rule at all, with respect to the time of the action, was observed; that it was not only allowed to exceed "a single revolution of the "sin," but was "indefinite" (aopis) like that of the Epic Poem. This evidently cannot be applied, without absurdity, to the time of representation. Yet so it is applied by Dacier in his note on this passage, p. 70.

But it appears farther, I think, from what is faid, and plainly faid, in this chapter, that, after all we have heard so often about this famous unity of time, the rule receives not the least support from Aristotle's authority. Every one, who knows how much stress has been laid by modern critics on the three dramatic unities, and happens not to be well acquainted with Aristotle's treatise on Poetry, would, I suppose, naturally take it for granted, that they are all explicitly laid down, and enforced by him, as effential and indispensable laws, in that famous code of dramatic criticism. But the fact is, that, of these three rules, the only one that can be called called important—that of the unity of action—is, indeed, clearly laid down and explained, and, with great reason, confidered by him as indifpenfable. Of the two other unities, that of place is not once mentioned, or even hinted, in the whole book; and all that is faid, respecting the time of the action, is faid in this chapter, and in these words: "Tragedy endeavours, as far as possible, " to confine its action within the limits of a fingle revolution of "the fun, or nearly fo "." Almost all the commentators feem agreed in understanding the expression, μια περιοδώ ήλιε, to mean only an artificial day. But I own I could never yet perceive any good reason, why we should not permit Aristotle to mean what he feems, in plain terms, to fay. If he meant only twelve hours, why did he prefer an expression so ambiguous, to say the least of it, as μιαν περιοδον ήλιε, to the clear and obvious expression of μιαν 'HMEPAN?-But, to wave this question, the utmost, which the most strenuous advocates for the unity of time can make of this passage, is this—that the Poet should endeavour, as far as possible, to confine the supposed time of the action to that of a single day, or nearly fo. Now it feems allowed, that none of the Greek Tragedies extant could have taken up, in the representation, more than three or four hours. What Aristotle, therefore, here fays, is so far from being a rule for the unity of time, that, on the contrary, it is faying as plainly as possible, that, in bis view, it was no duty incumbent on the dramatic Poet even to aim at the observance of fuch a rule: for, had he thought otherwife, his mode of expression would, furely, have been very different. He would have proposed the strict unity of time—the exact coincidence of the actual time of representation with the supposed time of the action—as the point of perfection, at which the Poet was to aim: he would have faid, "Tragedy endeavours, as far as possible, to confine its action " within the time of representation, or nearly so."

 ⁻ ότιμαλιτα πειραται ύπο μιαν περιοδον ήλικ είναι, ή μικρον εξαλλαττείν. Сар. v.

It is certain, indeed, that the nature of the drama, firitly and rigoroufly confidered, would require, I will not fay, to the perfection, but to the closeness, of its imitation, the exact coincidence here mentioned; and it is on this foundation only, that any rule at all relative to time could be necessary, and that the dramatic Poet could, with any reason, be denied the privilege of the Epic. All I contend for is, that Aristotle has no where required such a coincidence; that he has not even mentioned it; much less has he, either here, or in any other part of his work, enjoined it as a rule. His rule is, as generally understood, "confine your action, as "nearly as you can, to a single day;"—or, as I think, in conformity to his plain words, it should be understood—" to a single "revolution of the sun, or twenty-four hours"."

It may, perhaps, be objected, that Aristotle has not delivered this in the form of a rule; that he only refers to fact, and to the usual practice of the dramatic Poets of his time. "Tragedy en-"deavours," &c. But, surely, to mention the general practice of Poets with seeming approbation, or, at least, without a word to the contrary, is, in fact, to erect that practice, (as he has done on many other occasions throughout his treatise,) into a rule.—It is sufficient for my purpose, that, at least, he has given no other rule.

Moreover, what he here fays of the practice of the Greek dramatifts, feems fomewhat adverse to the language of those modern critics, who so often appeal, if I mistake not, to that very practice, for the support of their rigorous unity of time. For, if his b It is diverting to hear Castelvetro gravely setting forth the inconveniences of being shut up for four and twenty hours in a theatre:—"Il tempo siretto è quello, che i veditori possono à suo agio dimorare sedendo in theatro; il quale io non veggo che possa passare il giro del sole, si come dice Aristotele, cio è, hore dodici: conciosia cosa che per le necessità del corpo, come è, mangiare, bere, diporre i superflui pesi del ventre et della vesua, dormire, et per altre necessità, non possa il popolo continuare oltre il predetto termino così satta dimora in theatro."—p. 109.

expression does not prove, that he thought the rule of a fingle revolution of the sun the only rule which the Poets ought to observe, it surely proves, because it actually says, that he thought it the only rule, which, in general, they did observe. But what says Dacier? "Une Tragedie, pour être parfaite, ne doit occuper ni plus, ni moins de tems, pour l'action, que pour la representation; car elle est alors dans toute la vraisemblance. Les Tragiques Grecs L'ONT TOUJOURS PRATIQUE'." What he adds, it seems not very easy to comprehend: "Et ils s'en sont fait une loi si indispensable, que pour ne la pas violer, ils ont quelquesois violente leurs incidens, d'une monière que je ne conseillerois pas de suivre:" i. e. in plain English, (for I can make nothing else of it,) "they have so scrupu-" lously adhered to the rule, that, sometimes, for the sake of ob-" serving it, they have been obliged to break it." p. 118.

I believe, every reader, who, in perufing the Greek Tragedians, has taken the pains to examine this matter, must be fensible, that what Dacier so confidently afferts, of their constant adherence to this rule, is palpably false. I shall only mention one remarkable instance of the utter neglect of it, and that in Sophocles; who, in this, as in other respects, is usually regarded, I think, as the most correct and regular of the three Greek Poets whose Tragedies are in our hands. In his Trachinia, v. 632, Lichas fets out to carry the poisoned garment to Hercules, whom he finds upon the Cenaan promontory, which is faid to be about fixty Italian miles from the fcene of the action. At v. 734, Hyllus, who was present when his father received the garment, arrives with the terrible relation of its effects. Thus, during the performance of about a hundred lines, a journey of about one hundred and twenty Italian miles is supposed to have been taken.—For this, and other instances of the same kind, I must content myself with referring the reader to the sensible and well written Estratto della Poetica d'Aristotile, published among the posthumous works of Metastasio, and which did not fall into my hands till all my notes were written. It contains many ingenious and fagacious observations. The subject of the dramatic unities, in particular, is discussed at large, and, I think, in a very masterly and satisfactory way. And, with respect to the strict unities of time and place, he seems perfectly to have succeeded in shewing, that no such rules were imposed on the Greek Poets by the critics, or by themselves;—nor are imposed on any Poet, either by the nature, or the end, of the dramatic imitation itself.

It would be inexcusable to quit this subject without reminding the reader, that the unities of time and place, were long ago powerfully, and, in my opinion, unanswerably combated, as far as their principles are concerned, by Dr. Johnson, in his preface to Shakfpeare, p. 20, &c.

N O T E 44.

P. 75. IN THE WAY, NOT OF NARRATION, BUT OF ACTION.

It is furprifing, that so strange a phrase as ἐιδων---δοωντων—formis---agentibus—should have passed as genuine with any Greek scholar. It is still more so, that the obvious opposition of δοωντων to ἀπαγγελια, and the no less obvious absurdity of ορροsing narration to pity and terror, (ἐ δὶ ἀπαγγελιας, ΑΛΛΑ δὶ ἐλεε και φοθε) should have escaped the notice of any commentator.—I should write the passage thus; still considering it as imperfect:—χωρις ἐναςε των ἐιδων ἐν τοις μοριοις * * * [forte ΔΙΑ] δοωντων και ἐ δὶ ἀπαγd Capitolo 5.

^{*} See the beginning of cap. iii. Transl. seet. 4.—I am glad to find myself well supported in these remarks by Mr. Winstanley's note on this passage. Ed. Ox. 1780, 2.278.—I cannot, however, but still regard the text as defective.

γελιας * * * * αλλα δι έλευ και φοβυ, κ. τ. αλ. Thus the word δρωντων will retain its proper sense, and the active imitation of the drama, which Aristotle every where makes its characteristic distinction, as opposed to the Epic, will be, as we might expect to find it, in a formal and exact definition of Tragedy, distinctly marked.

I will just observe, farther, that this mode of expression—δρωντων ΚΑΙ ΟΥ δι ἀπ. is familiar to Aristotle. — Here however it may be justified by the necessity of marking clearly the distinction between Dramatic and Epic Poetry. In other instances, as, έτερως και μη τον ἀυτον τροπον. cap. i.—ώς τον ἀυτον και μη μεταβαλλοντα. cap. iii.—είδως και μη ἀγνοων. Eth. Nic. v. 8.—it seems hardly to admit of the same excuse. In the Poets we are less surprised to find it frequent. Victorius has pointed out Homer, Il. Z. 333.

- ἐπɨι με κατ' ἀισαν ἐνεικεσας, ἐδ' ὑπερ ἀισαν.
 -- and Sophocles:

If any man, in reading the antients, can persuade himself to take such things for beauties, there is certainly no harm in it. The fact I take to be, that composition, even that of Poetry, was not yet so far improved and refined, as perfectly to exclude the inaccuracies and redundancies of popular and familiar speech.

N O T E 45.

P. 75. Effecting, through pity and terror, the correction and refinement of such passions.

Δι' ελεε και φοβε περαινεσα την των τοιετων παθηματων καθαρσιν.—A history of the controversies which this obscure passage has excited among critics and commentators, and an exact statement and examination of the various explanations which have been given of it, would would almost fill a volume. Among these, however, the opinions, that are worth regarding, or that can, with any shew of probability, be deduced from Aristotle's expression, are, I think, reducible to two. One is, that this purgation, or moderation, of the passions. is merely the effect of having them frequently excited, and of being familiarized with the occasions of them, in Tragic fiction; just as the passions of pity and terror are actually purged, or reduced to moderation, in a furgeon, a physician, or a foldier, by their being accustomed to those terrible or piteous objects that occafion them. - The other interpretation attributes the effect to the moral lesson and example of the drama: Tragedy purges the passions by the striking pictures it sets before us of the dreadful calamities occasioned by the unrestrained indulgence of them; by giving useful warnings, and preparing us to bear the ills of life with patience.—One, or the other, or hoth, of these meanings, have, I think, been attributed to Aristotle by the best commentators and For the first, the reader may see Mr. Harris's Disc. on Music, Painting, &c. ch. v. note .- Heinf. De Trag. Const. cap. ii. p. 22, 23. and Caftelvetro, p. 117, 118.—For the fecond, Madius; —D'Alembert in his letter to Rouffeau, Melanges, tom. ii. p. 414.— Dryden, Obs. on the Eneid.—Abbè Du Bos, Refl. sur la Poesse, tom. i. fect. 44, &c. - For an explanation compounded of the two, Robortelli, Piccolomini, and Dacier, who, by the way, after declaring that all the explanations of former commentators "ferved " only to obfoure the paffage," and that the true fense was not to be found in any of them, proceeds to give us, as that true fense, and as his own discovery, exactly what had been said before him*.

Let us first see what Aristotle says. He says, that Tragedy, by the means of pity and terror, effects the purgation (καθαφσω) of such passions: i. e. of pity and terror and other passions of the same kind: for pity and terror seem clearly meant, by the expression, to be included in the effect. And this, in my opinion, is sufficient to overturn the fecond of the explanations just mentioned; for, according to that, terror and pity are not both the means and the object of the purgation, as Aristotle, I think, afferts them to be, but they are the means only of purging other passions—those passions, whatever they may be, which are supposed to produce the calamitous events exhibited to our view. Indeed, according to this idea, the object is rather the vice that arises from passion, than the passion itself which is the cause of it. But, besides this objection, I do not see any reason to think, that the moral lesson of the drama, and the effects it might have in moderating our paffions through the reflections it excites in us, were at all in Aristotle's thoughts*. The first of the two explanations feems far more admissible. I believe it made a part of his idea, but I doubt whether it was the whole of it. What was precifely his meaning, and the whole of his meaning, will never, I fear, be the subject of a perfect, Stoical καταληψις to any man. There is, however, one paffage in Aristotle's works, which throws some little light upon this; enough, at least, to keep us from false interpretations, if not to lead us to the true. It is in the feventh chapter of his eighth book De Republica. The Abbé Batteux is the only commentator I know of, who has paid a proper attention to this passage; but as I do not perfectly agree with him, either as to the translation he has given, or the use he makes of it, I shall produce so much of the original as appears to be of any importance to our prefent purpofe, and fubjoin a translation, with some necessary remarks.

The object of Aristotle, in the chapter referred to, is, to examine what kinds of Music (i. e. of melody and rhythm,) are proper to be used in the education of youth. He mentions and approves a division, made by some philosophical writers of that time, of the different kinds of melodies, into Moral, Active, and Enthusiastic: $\tau \alpha \mu \varepsilon \nu H\Theta IKA$, $\tau \alpha \delta \varepsilon \Pi PAKTIKA$, $\tau \alpha \delta \varepsilon \Pi PAKTIKA$. By the first of these we are to understand a manly, grave, and simple melody. The fense of meanting is less clear; but I suppose it means a more complicated and imitative fort of melody, adapted to express human actions; for, in the 49th of the Harmonic Problems [Sect. 19.] it is faid of the Hypo-Phrygian mode, that it had $n\theta \otimes$ πρακτικον, and was, on that account, used only in the dialogue and action of the drama, never in the choral part^b. And the fame epithet, πρακτικου, is applied, in this treatife, to the Iambic measure. As to enthufiaftic, it wants no explanation.—Aristotle then proceeds to observe, that " Music was to be used, not for one useful purpose "only, but for feveral," which he enumerates; and one of them is—ΚΑΘΑΡΣΕΩΣ ένεκα: with respect to which he says— τ_i δε λεγομεν την καθαρσιν, νυν μεν, άπλως παλιν δε, ΕΝ ΤΟΙΣ ΠΕΡΙ ΠΟΙΗ-TIKHE, EPRMEN σαφες ερου:—" What I mean by Καθαρσις, or purga-"tion, I shall now explain only in a short and general way; but "hereafter, in the books concerning Poetry, more explicitly and " clearly."—And this, I suppose, he had done, in that part of this treatife which is loft.—He then proceeds thus:

^{*} See the concluding NOTE.

— Φανερον, ότι χρησεον μεν πασαις ταις άρμονιαις, ε τον άυτον δε τροπον πασαις χρησεον άλλα προς μεν την παιδειαν, ταις ήθικωταταις προς δε άκροασιν [f. ΚΑΘΑΡΣΙΝ], έτερων χειρεργεντων, και ταις πρακτικαις, και ταις ένθεσιαςικαις. ό γαρ περι ένιας συμβαινει παθω ψυχας ίσχυρως, τετο έν πασαις ύπαρχει τω δε ήττον διαφερει και τω μαλλον. όιον, ΕΛΕΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΦΟΒΟΣ. έτι δ' ένθεσιασμω παι γαρ ύπο ταυτης της κινησεως κατακωχιμοι τινες είσιν. έκ δε των ίερων μελων όρωμεν τετες, όταν χρησωνται τοις έξοργιαζεσι την ψυχην μελεσι, καθιςαμενες, ώσπερ ΙΑΤΡΕΙΑΣ τυχοντας και ΚΑΘΑΡΣΕΩΣ. τάυτο δη τετο άναγκαιον πασχειν και τες έλεημονας, και τες φοβητικες, και τες όλως παθητικες τες δ' άλλες, καθ' όσον έπιβαλλει των τοιετων έκαςω,

^{*} He favs too—κατα δε την ὑποδωριει και ὑποφορυγιει, ΠΡΑΤΤΟΜΕΝ ὁ ἐκ ἀκειον ἐτι χορω ἐτι γαρ ὁ χορῷ πηθευτης ΑΠΡΑΚΤΟΣ.—κ. τ. λ.—The whole Problem, though mutilated, is curious, and throws fome little glimmering of light upon the Greek drama, as far as Music is concerned.

^{*} Cap. xxiv.—το μεν [i. e. the Trochaic tetrameter,] όχχησικου το δε, [the Lambic verse,] ΠΡΑΚΤΙΚΟΝ. Whence Horace's,—" nature robus agendis." A. P. 83.

και πασι γιγνεσθαι ΤΙΝΑ ΚΑΘΑΡΣΙΝ, και κυφίζεσθαι μεθ ήδονης. [p. 458. $Ed.\ Duval.$]*

In this passage, for ἀκροατω I have no doubt that we should read καθαρσω. The similitude of the words is sufficient to account for the mistake of the transcriber; and the purport of the whole passage seems to require the correction. For Aristotle is here shewing, in what manner the three different kinds of melody were to be applied to the different purposes, which he had just enumerated: προς ΜΕΝ την ΠΑΙΔΕΙΑΝ, ταις ήθια. προς ΔΕ την ΚΑΘΑΡΣΙΝ,—ταις πρακτικαις, &cc. The opposition is clear. And so, afterwards, a third purpose is mentioned—προς ΑΝΑΠΑΥΣΙΝ. [p. 459.] The words immediately following, ἐτερων χειρεργεντων, probably contributed to this mistake. They allude to his doctrine, in the preceding chapter, that boys should not be allowed to practice or perform, themselves, any but the simplest kind of Music, and upon the sim-

* This paffage may be confidered, alone, as a complete refutation of an opinion published fome years ago by Professor Moor, of Glasgow, on the subject discussed in this note. He afferts, that by παθηματα Aristotle does not mean passions, but sufferings, or calamities; and that the fenfe of δι έλει και φοβι περαρίσσα την των τοικτών παθηματών καθαρσιν, is—effecting, or endeavouring to effect, "the removal of fuch calamities," (i. e. as are reprefented in Tragedy,) " by means of exciting the passions of pity and " terror." But the fense, both of καθαρσις, and of παθηματα, is fixed, beyond dispute, by the paffage I have quoted, where pity, terror, and other paffions, are clearly mentioned as the objects of the καθαφσις, or purgation. The Professor also asserts, that the word, which Aristotle uniformly uses to express the passions, is παθη, and that by παθηματα is "always meant, sufferings, or calamities." This is a mistake. Παθη is continually used by Aristotle in the sense of sufferings; and malinuara sometimes, though less frequently, in the sense of passions. So, Rhet. II. 22. p. 574. C. xox περι των ήθων, και ΠΑΘΗΜΑΤΩΝ-" concerning manners and paffions." See also, Moral. Eudem. II. 2. p. 205. B. where παθη and παθηματα are used synonymously. Many other instances, I make no doubt, are to be found in Aristotle's works.

I should add, that I take my account of this explanation, and the arguments by which it is supported, from the Monthly Review, vol. xxx. p. 65; not having been able to procure the pamphlet itself, of which the title is—" On the end of Tragedy, " according to Aristotle: an Essay, in two parts, &c.—By James Moor, LL.D. Prof. of " Greek in the Univ. of Glasgow."—It is mentioned again, with approbation, in the 64th vol. of the same Review, p. 556.

Hh 2

plest and easiest instruments, such as were not dequeva xequerymas enumers. [p. 457.] But this was not the character either of the active and enthujiastic melodies, of which he here speaks, or of the instrument used in the accompaniment of them.

I fliall now give what I think a fair and literal version of the passage.—

"It is manifest then, that all the different kinds of melodies are " to be made use of; not all, however, for the same purpose. For " education, the most moral kind should be used: for PURGATION, " both the active, and the evilustaftic; - performed, however, by "others. For those passions, which in some minds are violent, "exist, more or less, in all; such as PITY, for example, and "TERROR: and, again, enthusiasm; for with this passion some "men are subject to be possessed: but when the facred melodies, " intended to compose the mind after the celebration of the orgic-"rites, have been performed, we see those men become calm and "fedate, as if they had undergone a kind of purgation, or cure. "And the cafe must necessarily be the same with those who are " particularly liable to be moved by PITY, or TERROR, or any "other passion; and with other men, as far as they are under the "influence of any fuch paffion; all of them experiencing a fort of "PURGATION, and PLEASURABLE RELIEF."

From this passage, though far enough, I am sensible, from being persectly clear and explicit, two things, at least, may, I think, be considently deduced.—I. That whatever be the meaning of the term nadagous, or purgation, here, must also be its meaning in the treatise on Poetry; since to that work Aristotle refers for a suller explanation of it. The only difference is, that here, the term is applied to the effect of imitative Music; there, to that of imitative Poetry; of that species of it, however, which depended, we know, upon Music, for a very considerable part of its effect. 2. It is plain, that, according to Aristotle's idea, pity was to be purged by pity, terror by terror, &c.; contrary to the fecond of the two explanations above mentioned. For Aristotle is here expressly speaking of the use of enthusiastic Music applied moss καθαρτιν; and he fays, that men, agitated by enthusiasm, were purged or relieved from that enthufiasm by the ίερα μελη, which were plainly enthusiastic melodies; i. e. such as imitated, or expressed, that passion, and were intended to calm the mind, which had been violently agitated and inflamed; not, as M. Batteux understands, by the sudden opposition of Doric, grave, and moral strains, [p. 280, 1.] but by pleasurable indulgence of the same passion in imitative Mulic: κεφιζεσθαι μεθ' ήδονης. These melodies were, probably, fuch as those of Olympus, which had been mentioned just before [cap. 5.] and of which Aristotle says, that they, 'Ouodoyeμενως ΠΟΙΕΙ ΤΑΣ ΨΥΧΑΣ ΕΝΘΟΥΣΙΑΣΤΙΚΑΣ. Indeed, from the manner, in which the Music of Olympus is spoken of by Plato, and Plutarch, there is great reason to suppose, that these " facred melodies" were no other, than the very melodies of that mulician.

^{*} The Ava⊕. See ibid. p. 459 and 457. And above, p. 148, note •.

With respect to this καθαρσις itself, Aristotle by no means gives us in this passage, nor, indeed, prosesses to give us, a full and satisfactory explanation of it. Some light, however, he has slung upon it by the expressions, ιατρεια, and κεφιζεσθαι μεθ΄ ήδοιης, which he uses as synonymous to καθαρσις: "Purgation, cure, pleasurable relief." The Abbé Batteux understands Aristotle to mean no more by this, than that the passions of terror or pity, which, when excited by real objects, are simply painful, or, at least, have a predominant mixture of pain, are, by imitation, and the consciousness of sistion, purged or purified from this alloy of the disagreeable and painful, ⁻τες νομες τες ἀρμονικες ἐξενεγκεν [sc. Olympus.] εις των Εριαδα, εις νον χρωνται ες Εκκηνες εν ταις ἐορταις των θεων. Plut. de Mus. p. 2076. ed. H. S. See also Plato in the Minos, p. 318. ed. Serr. where he says of the melodies of Marsyas and Olympus, that they are, ΘΕΙΟΤΑΤΑ, και μονα ΚΙΝΕΙ. — See Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 359, &c.

and converted, on the whole, into an emotion of delight. His meaning may be clearer in his own words. Aristotle, he says, had established it as a principle—" Que les objets désagréables plaisent " quand ils sont imités, même lorsqu'ils le sont dans la plus grande " verité". En appliquant ce principe à la Tragedie, il s'ensuit, " que c'est l'imitation qui est la cause du plaisir qu'elle produit, et " non la nature des objets imités, puisque ces objets sont par eux-" memes défagréables. C'est donc l'imitation qui ôte à la terreur "et à la pitié l'accessoire désagréable qu'elles ont dans la realité: " c'est l'initation qui opere la purgation Tragique, en mettant les " malheurs imités à la place des malheurs réels, et en féparant par "ce moyen ce que la pitié et la terreur ont d'agréable, comme " emotions, d'avec ce qu'elles ont de désagréable, quand elles sont "jointes à l'idée de malheurs réels"." This account, which is exactly Fontenelle's folution of the pleasure arising from Tragic emotioni, is liable to a difficulty not eafily, I think, furmounted. It confines Aristotle's meaning to the present pleasure of the emotion; it supposes all the purgation to consist merely in rendering the feeling of the passion pleasurable; -not in any good effect which the habit of fuch emotion may produce, in correcting, refining, or moderating, fuch passions, when excited by real objects. Now, though it must be confessed, that Aristotle has not, in that fhort and professedly imperfect explanation given of the παθαρσις in the passage adduced, said any thing directly pointing to such effect, yet, I think, the whole turn and cast of his expression is such, as leads one naturally to conclude, that it was his meaning. The phrase, πυφ.ζεσθαι μεθ' ήδονης, does indeed appear to express the prefent effect only; but I can scarce conceive, that he would have [&]amp; Cap. iv. Tranfl. Part I. Seal. 5.

^{*} Principes de la Literature, tom, iii. p. 81.—I refer to that work, because the author appears to me to have explained himself there with more clearness and precision than in the note on his translation of Aristotle in the Quatre Poetiques.

i Reflect, sur la Poetique, Sea. 36 .- Hume's Essay on Tragedy.

used such a word as καθαρσις, and still less, IATPEIA, without a view to something beyond the pleasurable relief or vent of the moment; especially, in a chapter, where he is professedly enumerating and examining the uses of music^k. Farther, the words, ελεημονας, φοβητικες, παθητικες, confirm this idea; being all words expressive of habitual excess, requiring correction and moderation.

But, what still more strongly opposes the Abbé Batteux's idea, is, that Aristotle is here, as Heinfius and others have well obferved, evidently combating the doctrine of Plato, whose great objection to Tragedy, was, that it feeds and inflames the passions ". It could be no answer to this, to allege, that the feeling of passion excited by Tragic imitation is pleafurable; for this is fo far from being called in question by Plato, that it is the very foundation of his objection. The pleasure afforded by fuch Poetry is allowed by him in its utmost extent". "Let its advocates," he fays, "un-"dertake to shew us that it is not merely pleasurable, but useful "alfo, and we will lend a favourable ear to their apology; for we -" shall furely be gainers by the conviction"." Now Aristotle, if I understand him rightly, undertakes this apology, and points out the utility required. And no one, I think, can reasonably doubt, that fuch was his intention, who has attended to the following passage of Plato: - ἀπολαυειν ἀναγιη ἀπο των ἀλλοτριων εις τα οικεια. ΘΡΕΨΑΝΤΑ γαρ εν εκαινοις ΙΣΧΥΡΟΝ ΤΟ ΕΛΕΕΙΝΟΝ, ε ραδιον εν τοις $^{^{\}mathbf{k}}$ — $\mathring{\mathbf{s}}$ μιας ένεμεν $\Omega\Phi$ ΕΛΕΙΑΣ τη μεσική χρησθαι δείν. — Ubi fupra.

¹ The same thing seems implied in the word πατακωχιμοι; and in the expression— ¿ γαρ περι ἐνιας συμβαίνει παθΦ ψυχας ΙΣΧΥΡΩΣ—.

^m ΤΡΕΦΕΙ γας ταυτα, he fays, in his figurative language, ΑΡΔΟΥΣΑ, δεον ΑΥΧ-ΜΕΙΝ.—De Repub. lib. x. p. 606. D.

n Ibid. p. 607, C, D, ci passim.

[•] Δοιμεν δε γε πε άν και τοις προςαταις άυτης — λογον περι άυτης είπειν, ως ε μονον 'ΗΔΕΙΛ άλλα και ΩΦΕΛΙΜΗ προς τας πολιτείας και τον βιον τον άνθρωπινου έςι, και ευμείως ώνες σομεθα, κερδανεμεν γαρ πε, έαν μη μονον ήδεια φαιη, άλλα ΚΑΙ ΩΦΕΛΙΜΗ.—Ibid.

'ATTOT HAGEEI KATEXEIN.". For, to this objection, there cannot well be a more direct and pointed answer, than Aristotle's affertion, as usually understood—that the babit of including the emotions of pity, or terror, in the sictitious representations of Tragedy, tends, on the contrary, to moderate and refine those passions, when they occur in real life.

But though the Abbé Batteux's idea of this purgation appears to me by no means to be the whole, it must, I think, be admitted as a part, and an effential part, of Aristotle's meaning. For the effect depends, not merely, as some commentators seem to suppose, on the having our passions frequently and babitually excited, but, on the having them so excited by fictitious representation. Pity and terror frequently excited by such objects and such events in real life, as the imitations of the Tragic scene set before us, would rather tend to produce anathy than moderation. Nature would ftruggle against such violent and painful agitation, and the heart would become callous in its own defence. We must be insensible, that we might not be wretched. It is far otherwise with fictitious passion. There, the emotion, though often violent in spite of the consciousness of fiction, is always, more or less, delightful. We indulge it, as one of the first of pleasures; and the effect of that indulgence, frequently repeated, is perhaps, that, while it moderates real passion by the frequency of similar impressions, it, at the fame time, cherifhes fuch fympathetic emotions, in their proper and useful degree, by the delicious feelings which never fail to accompany the indulgence of them in imitative representation.

The passions of savages, or of men in the first rude stages of civilization, are serocious and painful. They pity, or they fear,

P Ibid. 606. B.—" The habit of indulging our passions in the concerns of others, will, of necessity, bring on the same habitual indulgence in those which relate to ourselves: for he, who has nourifhed and strengthened to excess the passion of pity, for example, by habitual sympathy, in the missortunes of other men, will not find it easy to restrain the same kind of feelings in his own."

⁹ Heinfius De Trag. Constit. cap. ii. - Harris On Music, &c. ch. v. note .

either violently, or not at all. With them, there is hardly any medium between ungovernable agitation, and abfolute infensibility. -Suppose such a people to have access, like the Athenians, to theatrical reprefentations, and to have their passions kept in frequent and pleafurable exercise by fictitious distress; the consequence, I think, would be, that, by degrees, they would come to have more feeling, and less perturbation. Instead of sympathetic emotions rarely excited, painfully felt, and foon extinguished, they would gradually acquire a calm, lasting, and useful habit of general tenderness and fensibility. In polished society, where the passions are accustomed to be indulged in fillion, either in the theatre, or by reading, and the pain is converted, on the whole, into one strong and delightful feeling, by the charms of imitation, Poetry, Music, aided by the indistinct consciousness of sictionthese passions, even when excited by real objects, seem to retain, (at least, in cases where we are not too closely touched,) some tincture of the same pleasurable emotion, which attended them, when raifed by works of imagination; they are more moderately and agreeably felt, more eafily governed, and more gentle and polifhed in their expressions.

Such appears to me, on the whole, to be the most probable explanation of Aristotle's meaning: I must, at least, confess it to be the only reasonable meaning, that I am able to discover. How far it is true, and founded on solid observation, is another question, which I willingly submit to the philosophical and thinking part of my readers.

I cannot omit to observe, that the short explanation given by MILTON, in the introduction to his Samson Agonistics, appears to coincide exactly, as far as it goes, with my idea of the passage.—
"Tragedy, as it was anciently composed, hath been ever held the gravest, moralest, and most prostable of all other Poems: "therefore said by Aristotle to be of power, by raising pity, and "fear or terror, to purge the mind of those and such like passions;

"that is, to temper and reduce them to just measure, with a kind of delight, stirred up by reading or seeing those passions well imitated."

One thing should be added. Aristotle's assertion must be confidered relatively to his own times, and nation. He speaks of the effects of Tragedy on the people of Athens, who, as reading was then no popular occupation', had scarce any opportunity of indulging fictitious emotion, but at the Theatre, and who, we know, were there accustomed to indulge it perpetually. With us, the case is widely different. The doctrine, therefore, of Aristotle, that "Tra-" gedy purges the passions," translated, if I may so speak, into modern truth, would perhaps amount only to this—that the habitual exercise of the passions by works of imagination in general, of the serious and pathetic kind, (such as Tragedies, Novels, &c.) has a tendency to soften and refine those passions, when excited by real objects in common life.

N O T E 46.

P. 75. IN SOME PARTS METRE ALONE IS EMPLOYED, IN OTHERS MELODY.

A passage of very tantalizing brevity. By δια μετζων MONON, are we to understand, according to the obvious and literal meaning of the expression, that in some parts of Tragedy the verse was merely recited, spoken, as in modern Tragedy?—This contradicts what, by many writers, has been considered as a fact thoroughly established, that the Greek Tragedy was accompanied by musical instruments, and was therefore strictly musical, throughout:—for as to the dreams of the Abbé Du Bos, Rousseau, and others, about a noted declamation, a declamation accompanied by Music, yet not source—this is too manifest an absurdity to stand in need of con-

· Sec Diff. I. p. 42.

futation.

0

futation. If, as Rousseau fays, it is "impossible to understand "what the antients have faid about their theatrical declamation, "without supposing this a," would it not be better to say, at once, that we do not understand it, than to explain it into impossibilities? As for the systematic Abbé Du Bos, he was set upon proving his point; and he proves it like a man resolved to prove it, by wresting all forts of authors to his purpose, and translating them as he pleased. All we know clearly, is, that the antient drama was accompanied, (in part, at least,) by musical instruments. I conclude, considently, that since the instruments could not speak, the actors must sing: that their declamation must certainly have been, strictly speaking, musical, however simple; the chanting of the simplest plain chant, being as truly Music, i. e. as essentially distinct from speech, as the most refined melody of a modern opera.

If, then, the Greek Tragedy had a musical accompaniment throughout, it must have been sung throughout. But here, Aristotle says, as plainly as words can say it, that in some parts of Tragedy, "metre only" was employed:—δια ΜΕΤΡΩΝ ἐνια ΜΟΝΟΝ: that is, as it is necessarily implied, without the two other πδυσματα, or seasonings, of Tragic language, just mentioned, melody and rhythm.

Some commentators, I know, endeavour to evade the force of this expression, by faying, that Aristotle means, by $\delta \iota \alpha$ $\mu \epsilon \tau \epsilon \varphi \omega \nu$ $\mu \epsilon \tau \epsilon \varphi \omega \nu$, only the noted declaration, which, being a fort of recitative, was not regarded as strictly musical, nor denominated $\mu \epsilon \lambda \otimes \epsilon$. And in b For a refutation of Du Bos, the reader may see Condillac's Essai sur l'orig. des comois. bumaines—tome iii. ch. 3.

² Dict. de Musique, Art. Opera.

[·] See Diff. II. p. 52. note v.

Δ Λεγω δε ήθυσμενον μεν λογου, του έχοντα ένθμου, και άξμουταν, και μετζον. Το δε, χωρις των είδων, το δια ΜΕΤΡΩΝ ΕΝΙΑ ΜΟΝΟΝ περαινεσθα:——.

[·] So M. Batteux.

fupport of this, it is alleged, that the word helps, speech, is applied by him afterwards in a fimilar manner ; as λεγεσθαι is also by Plutarch, who talks of "fome of the lambics being spoken with " an accompaniment, and others, fung : as we fometimes fay of a finger, that he speaks recitative well. But all this, I confess, does not fatisfy me. It is one thing, to apply occasionally the word λεξις or λεγεσθαι, in this comparative way, to fuch kind of finging as most resembles speech, and another, to say roundly, that some parts of Tragedy made use of metre, or verse, only; and that too, immediately after having fixed the exclusive fense of povon, by enumerating the three ήδυσματα of Tragic diction, which he afferts to be feparately used in different parts, i. e. ευθμω, άρμονια, μετρον , ... RHYTHM, MELODY, and METRE. They who dispute this meaning, must at least, I think, allow that if it bad been the meaning, Aristotle could not well have expressed it with more precision. How can μετρων here be taken in the loofe and comparative fense contended for, when, in the very words immediately preceding, it is carefully limited to its strict and proper fense, by being expressly discriminated from melody, as well as from rhythm?

But after all, the fact, that the Greek Tragedy was fung throughout, though often afferted, has not yet been proved; nor do I think that it can be proved; at least, by any passage of antient authors, that I have seen adduced to prove it. The Abbé Vatry, in a differtation, Sur la recitation des Tragedies anciennes, undertook to prove, in form, that the Greek Tragedies were sung, "d'un bout à l'autre," like our operas. But how does he prove this?

[·] See ch. xii.—ΑΕΞΙΣ όλε ΧΟΡΟΥ.

⁵ Dial. de Muf. p. 2090. ed. H. S.—Τα μεν λεγεσθαι παρα την μρεσιν, τα δε άδεσθαι.

The reading in all the MSS. is, ρυθμον, και άρμονιαν, και ΜΕΛΟΣ. On comparing this passage with Aristotle's other enumerations of the three means of imitation in cap. i. especially at the end of it, where Tragedy is mentioned as using all those means, κατα μες Φ, i. c. βυθμα, και μενει (which is synonymous to άρμονια elsewhere,) και ΜΕ-ΤΡΩι, no one, I think, can entertain any degree of doubt, as to the truth of Victorius's emendation, και ΜΕΤΡΟΝ.

—by proving, what indeed is eafily proved, that a part of the Iambies, or the dialogue, was fung, and then by taking it for granted, that the antients could not possibly have endured so barbarous a custom, as the mixture of speech and singing in the same piece. "If ne paroit pas qu'on puisse douter que ces cantiques ne se chantassent; mais de cela même je crois pouvoir conclurre, que tout le reste se chantoit, quoique differemment; car le bon sens, set ce que les anciens nous disent, nous conduit à penser que leur recitation etoit partout de même nature, et qu'elle ne se bigarroit point, tantôt d'une simple declamation, et tantôt u'un chant musical."

By the same presumptive mode of arguing, the Abbé might also have proved, à priori, that the Greeks could not possibly have been guilty of the modern barbarous bigarrure of serious and ludicrous, in their Tragic drama. But the first Greek Tragedy he had opened would probably have overturned his reasoning.

A thorough discussion of all the passages of antient authors, that throw any light upon this question, relative to the dramatic representations of the Greeks, would draw me much too far beyond my bounds. I must content myself with pointing out (for I think it has not been observed,) the stubborn difficulty which this passage of Aristotle appears to me to throw in the way of the common opinion upon this subject; and with hazarding a merely hypothetical conjecture, that, if, as Aristotle seems plainly to say, some part of the Greek Tragedy was spoken, like our Tragic declamation, without any musical accompaniment, it was, most probably, that part of the dialogue, which, as I have before observed, in NOTE 33, is, in every Tragedy, easily distinguished from the rest; by its being carried on in a fort of quick repartee of verse to verse.

¹ The 30th and 49th of Aristotle's Harmonic Prob. Sect. 19. are, alone, sufficient proofs of this point.

k Mem. de l'Acad. Roy. des Inscriptions, &c. tome II. p. 343, 281100.

¹ See NOTE 33.

As, in this part of the dialogue, we almost constantly find the Tragic tone lowered to a more colloquial pitch, and even approaching frequently to the jocular and burlesque, it seems reasonable to think, that here, if anywhere, the musical accompaniment, and the elevation of lengthened and chanting tones, were withdrawn, and common conversation lest to common speech.

But what, again, are we to understand by—και παλιν έτεοα δια μελες?—Are we to repeat μονον, and understand Nielody alone, without the two other ήδυσματα, Rhythm and Metre? This cannot be. For though we may strip the Tragic language of melody and of rhythm, or, in other words, of Music, we cannot strip it of metre. The antients most certainly did not admit prose into their Tragedies; and as little can we conceive them to have set prose to Music.

Dacier, and some other commentators, understand by $\mu \in \mathbb{N}$ here, Mnfic, including rhythm. This sense of the word is certainly warrantable; but it can hardly be the sense here: for, surely, an instance, in which all the three $n \in \mathbb{N}$ were used, (as they must be, if metre be indispensable, and $\mu \in \mathbb{N}$ imply rhythm and melody,) would be but a strange illustration of the $X\Omega PI\Sigma$ $n \in \mathbb{N}$ and $n \in \mathbb{N}$ we essent $n \in \mathbb{N}$.

I do not see what remains, but, that we take μ sh here in its most restrained sense, as distinct from rhythm, or time, and synonymous to square; that sense, in which Aristotle had used it before, in his sirst chapter. And if we do this, we must necessarily, I think,

m The reader will observe that Aristotle is expressly speaking of the hdνσματα of Tragic speech or language: λεγω δε hdνσμενον μεν ΛΟΓΟΝ τον έχοντα ένθμεν, &c.—Words, therefore, are equally implied in all these hdνσματα, and, consequently, Music alone—i.e. infrumental Music, is here entirely out of the question.

[&]quot; — ροδιώρ και ΜΕΛΕΙ και μετέρη, antworing to his first division, ρυθμόρ και λογφ και ΑΡΜΟΝΙΛι.

The word MEAOI, it may be useful to observe, occurs in three different musical fenses. 1. Sometimes, as here, and in the Greek writers on Music, in the same sense as against—i. e. melody, abstracted from rhythm, or time. Thus, Arishides Quintilianus,

I think, understand, that some parts of the dialogue were fung without rhythm: I mean, without mufical rhythm, or time, tho 2h certainly not without that poetical or profodic rhythm, by which in reciting verse, and, indeed, even in the most familiar conversation, the fyllabic quantity must have been relatively, at least, observed, though not, I prefume, with the inflexibility of mufical measure, nor with such a rigorous equality of long to long, and short to short, as is effential to the execution of what is properly called Mufic, and as I suppose to have been observed in the choral odes. the dialogue of the Greek Tragedy will appear to have been not improperly compared to our recitative; differing from the chorus. as our recitative differs from the airs, both in the absence of strict time, and in the kind of melody, which was also, as mere melody, lefs mufical than the choral melody, and more imitative of speech, as well as of action. Whether the monologues, or long speeches—the μακραι έησεις, as Plato calls them -were performed in the same way, as the rest of the dialogue, or, as it has been imagined, were diffinguished by being more measured and musical, is a point not eafily cleared up. The passages commonly appealed to for this

p. 32, and see p. 7, his account of μελφδια, &c. 2. Sometimes, for air, or measured melody; as in the definition of Bacchius, p. 19. (Ed. Meib.) 3. Sometimes it is used as equivalent to song, including melody, rhythm, and avords. Thus Plato—το ΜΕΛΟΣ εν τριων εςι συγμειμενον, λογε τε, και άξμονιας, και ρυθμε. Rep. iii. p. 398. D. In another place, however, he uses it in the first and narrowest sense, for mere melody: ΜΕΛΟΣ δ'αν ΚΑΙ ρυθμον ἀνεν ρηματών, De Leg. ii. p. 669.—This third, and sullest sense of the word is what A. Quintil. expresses by μελΘ- τελειον. p. 6.

^{*} This has been well remarked by Dr. Burney, Hift. of Mus. vol. i. p. 161. "The melody of antient declamation," &c.—M. Burette goes so far as to suppose, that πρ strict rhythm was admitted even in the choral part of the antient Tragedy. His authority is the following passage of Plutarch's Dial. do Mus.—τφ μεν χεωματικώ γειει, και ΡΥΘΜΩι, τραγφδια μεν έδεπω και τημερον πεχρηται. p. 2084. ed. H. S. But the text here is evidently corrupt. The name of some particular species of rhythm is probably omitted. See Mem. de l'Acad. des Inscrip. tome xix. p. 427. octavo.

^{*} See Aristotle's Problems, Sect. 19. Prob. xv. and xlix.

⁹ De Rep. x. p. 605.

purpose, from the grammarians Diomedes and Donatus, about the Cantica of the Roman Comedy, I look upon as a very frail foundation of any conclusion with respect to the Greek Tragedy'. The passage of Plutarch above quoted, note *, furnishes the strongest support I know of for such a distinction. For, if by " spoken or recited to an instrumental accompaniment," ($\tau \alpha \mu \varepsilon \nu$ sic. $\tau \omega \nu i \alpha \mu \beta \varepsilon \omega \nu$] AEPESOAI $\tau \alpha \rho \alpha \tau \eta \nu \nu \rho \omega \sigma \omega$) Plutarch meant, as I think he must mean, sing in recitative, not literally sieken, (for how could that admit of a musical accompaniment?) then, $\alpha \delta \varepsilon \sigma \theta \alpha \iota$, which is opposed to it, must of course imply, not mere singing as opposed to speech, but a more musical and measured melody.

N O T E 47.

P. 76. THE MEANING OF MELOPOEIA IS OBVIOUS—.

I have ventured to depart from the common interpretation, by understanding the word δυναμις, here, to mean, not the power, and effect, of the Melopæia itself, but the power, i. e. the meaning, of the term. Aristotle is here, as usual, explaining the terms he had made use of. It was directly to his purpose to say, as a reason for omitting a definition in this instance, that the meaning of the word was well known; but not at all to his purpose, to say—" I "need not explain the word, because the power and effect of the thing "signified by it, (that is, of Music,) is well known."

Dacier is amufing here. He wonders what could induce the Greeks to make Music a part of their drama; and at last, "aprés bien des recherches," he discovers one principal cause to have been this—that they had very musical ears; but he does not dis-r See the Abbè Du Bos, Reflex. fur la Poef. &c. vol. iii. Seel. 11, &c.—This writer's explanation of the passage of Aristotle that we have been considering, is worth the reader's inspection, as a perfect model of misrepresentation, absurdity, and blundering.

cover the cause of his own wonder, which, in all probability, was, that be had not.

N O T E 43.

P. 76. OR DELIVERING A GENERAL SENTIMENT.

In the Rhetoric, Aristotle defines γυωμη by καθολε ἀποφανσις. [Lib. ii. cap. xxi. p. 572.] Thus below, in this chapter, for, ἀποφαινονται γνωμην, his first expression, we have, καθολε ἀποφαινονται.—This has been loosely and inaccurately rendered in all the translations I have seen, except those of Castelvetro and Goulston.

N O T E 49.

P. 76. THESE PARTS----HAVE BEEN EMPLOYED BY MOST POETS.

Locus, as the critics fay, conclamatus. Time is too precious to be wasted in the support, or resultation, of random conjectures upon a passage of such desperate corruption.—How can ἐκ ἐλυγοι, " not " a few," be tortured into, " all," or, " almost all?" Yet so Dacier, Batteux, Goulston, &c. On the other hand, if fairly translated, " not a few Poets have made use of these parts," how strangely it will follow—" for EVERY Tragedy has them all!"—And how is the ως ἐιπεν, to be applied? to ἐκ ἐλυγοι, or, to ἐιδεσι?

In the midst of these difficulties, all I could do was to make my version consistent with itself; faithful to the original, I could not make it, without making it nonsensical.

Those commentators, who apply the ως ειπειν to the word ειδεσι, seem favoured by ch. xii. where, speaking of the same essential parts of Tragedy, Aristotle says—δις μεν ΩΣ ΕΙΔΕΣΙ δει χρησθαι.

N O T E 50.

P. 77. THE SUPREME GOOD ITSELF----IS ACTION, NOT QUALITY.

See Ethic. Nicom. I. 5, 7, 8. ed. Wilk. & Mag. Moral. I. 4, p. 149, 150, ed. Duval.

N O T E 51.

P. 77. THE TRAGEDIES OF MOST MODERN POETS HAVE THIS DEFECT.

This receives illustration from what Aristotle presently after says, of "the rhetorical manner prevailing in the Poets of his "time:" δι δε νυν, ξητορικώς. cap. vi: and from his observation, at the close of cap. xxiv. [Transl. Part III. Sect. 6.] that "the "manners and sentiments are only obscured by too splendid a "diction."

What he has here faid of the recent Tragedies of his time, may perhaps be faid, in general, of our modern Tragedies, compared with those of Shakspeare. The truth, I believe, is, that the Tragedy of a refined and polished age will always have less $n\theta$ than that of ruder times, because it will have more dignity; more of that uniform and level elevation, which excludes strong traits of character, and the simple, unvarnished delineation of the manners. Indeed, what the Greeks denominated $n\theta$, is the peculiar province of Comedy, and is seldom to be found in Tragedy, except in that stage of its progress, when it is not yet thoroughly and distinctly separated from Comedy; from the imitation of common ^{*} Illud (%) Comadia, hoc (παθΦ) Tragædiæ, fimile.—Quintil. p. 302, ed. Gib.

8 life, and natural manners. Such are the Tragedies of Shakfpeare; and fuch, as I have before ventured to fuggest, are those of Euripides in particular, which, in proportion as they have less dignity, have more 700, than the Tragedies of Sophocles. But in neither of them, nor, probably, even in those very Poets here cenfured by Aristotle, was the "language of Poets," substituted for

"the language of men"," as it is almost constantly in the French Tragedy, and too, often, in our own Tragedies of the French school.

N O T E 52.

P. 77. POLYGNOTUS EXCELS IN THE EXPRESSION OF THE MANNERS.

I fee not the smallest reason for the substitution of ἀγαθων, for ἀγαθω, which is the reading, we are told, of all the MSS. What Aristotle had said before of Polygnotus, cap. ii.—ἐτι κρειτιες ἐκκαζε—seems not to afford the slightest ground for alteration here. [See Mr. Winstanley's ed. p. 281.] Painters are compared in very different points of view, in these two passages: there, as imitating good or bad, serious or ridiculous, elevated or low, objects: here, only as expressing, or not expressing, manners. It was directly to Aristotle's purpose to say, that Polygnotus was a "good manner-"painter;" (ἀγαθω ἡθογραφω)—not at all to his purpose, (besides the awkwardness of the expression itself,) to say, that he was "a manner-painter of good men:" (ἀγαθων ἡθογραφω.)

^{• —} ἀπλεν, fays Demetrius, και ἀποιητον, το λθΦ. Sect. 28.—And fee Longinus, Sect. 9, where he very justly calls the Odysley, κωμωρδια τις λθολογεμενη, [&]quot; Addison," says Dr. Johnson in his admirable preface to Shakspeare, "speaks the language of Poets, and Shakspeare, of men.—The composition refers us only to the writer; we pronounce the name of Cato, but we think on Addison."

N O T E 53.

P. 77. Just as in Painting, &c.

I hope I shall not much shock even the most conscientious adherents to the established inaccuracy and authentic blunders of antient manuscripts, by having ventured to adopt here the transposition sirst proposed, I believe, by Castelvetro^a. I can only desire those readers, who may be alarmed at my temerity, to read the passage—παραπλησιον γαρ ἐςι—α. τ. αλλ.—to, ἐικονα,—sirst, where it stands in all the editions, and then, where I have placed it, immediately after the words—ἐχυσα δε μυθον και συς ασιν πραγματων.—
If this experiment alone be not sufficient to convince them of the propriety, or, rather, the necessity, of the transposition, I despair of the success of any arguments I am able to produce in the support of it. To me, I consess, it is among those things that are too evident for proof.

N O T E 54.

P. 77. ADVENTURERS IN TRAGIC WRITING ARE SOONER ABLE, &c.—

Aristotle argues here upon a principle rather rhetorical and popular, than philosophical—that, which infers superior worth from ^a Poetica d'Aristotele, &c. p. 142. Ed é da sapere, che di sotto si truovano in luogo non convenevole queste parole, παραπλησιον— εικονα. Le quali parole debbono seguitare prossimamente dopo πραγματων, &c. Heinsius, too, saw the necessity of the transposition, but appears to me to have, in a great measure, destroyed the propriety of it, by inserting the passage, not immediately after πραγματων, but after ἀκαγνωρισεις, in the next sentence. See his note, in Goulston's ed. or the Ox. ed. 1780.

fuperior difficulty and rarity:—το χαλεπωτερου και σπανιωτερου, μειζου, (fc. αγαθου,) as he lays it down in his Rhetoric, lib. i. cap. vii. p. 529.

Lord Bacon, in his Essay On Gardens, uses the same argument, and almost in Aristotle's words, with respect to the superiority of gardening to architecture: "A man shall ever see, that when ages "grow to civility and elegancy, men come to build stately sooner "than to garden finely; as if gardening were the greater perfection."

The truth, however, of the fact here afferted by Aristotle, appears, not only from the earlier dramatic Poets of every nation, but from the defects of plots in general, whether Dramatic or Epic; and from the rarity of those dramatic fables, for which the Poet has trusted entirely to his own invention, without recourse to history, or novels, or the productions of other dramatists.—" En "general, il y a plus de pieces bien dialoguées, que de pieces bien conduites. Le Génie qui dispose les incidens, paroit plus rare que celui qui trouve les vrais discours. Combien de belles scenes dans Moliere!—On compte ses dénouemens beureux.——On feroit tenté de croire qu'une drame devroit être l'ouvrage de deux hommes de génie, l'un qui arrangeât, et l'autre qui fit parler."—Diderot, de la Poes. Dram. p. 288.

N O T E 55.

P. 78. To this part belongs, &c.--

² See Harris's Philol, Inq. p. 160.

"ici l'ordre naturel. Les sentimens sont pour les mœurs, ce que les mœurs sont pour l'action. Comme un Poete tragique ne peut bien imiter une oction, qu'en employant les mœurs, il ne peut non plus bien marquer les mœurs, que par le moyen des fentimens; & par consequent les sentimens tiennent le troisseme rang dans la Tragedie."

N O T E 56.

P. 78. Which, in the dialogue, depends on the Political and Rhetorical arts.

— Όπερ, ἐπι των λογων, της πολιτικης και ἑητορικης ἐργον ἐςιν.—I have not feen the words, ἐπι των λογων, fatisfactorily explained. I cannot agree with those commentators, who by λογοι, here, understand, oratory, prose eloquence, as opposed to Poetry: a sense, indeed, very common, in Aristotle and other writers; but if we adopt it here, how follows—δι ΓΑΡ ἀρχαιοι πολιτικως ΕΠΟΙΟΥΝ λεγοντας? for here, Aristotle evidently speaks of Poets; not of orators, as Dacier renders it. The passage, then, fairly translated, would stand thus:—" which, (i. e. the choice of proper sentiments,) in "ORATORY, is the business of the political and rhetorical arts: " FOR the antient Tragic Poets made their characters speak politically," &c. Nothing can well be more incoherent.

Eπι των λογων, means, I think,—in the speeches, discourse, or dialogue part of the drama, as distinguished from the choral or syric part, which had nothing, or comparatively nothing, to do with ηθω or character, and in which the Poet was, of course, to draw his διανοια, or thoughts, principally at least, from different sources; not from the stores of civil wisdom, or rhetorical art, but from those of Religion, Ethics, Mythology, and Poetry. The word λογοι, is clearly used in the same sense, in a passage that presently follows:—διοπερ ἐκ ἐχεσιν ηθω ἐνιοι των ΛΟΓΩΝ—" some of the speeches, or the dialogue."

NOTE

N O T E 57.

P. 78. FOR THE ANTIENTS MADE THEIR CHARACTERS SPEAK IN THE STYLE OF POLITICAL AND POPULAR ELO-QUENCE; BUT NOW, THE RHETORICAL MANNER PREVAILS.

'Οι μεν γας ἀρχαιοι ΠΟΛΙΤΙΚΩΣ ἐποιεν λεγοντας, δι δε νυν, ἐητοςικως.— So, Rhet. lib. ii. cap. xxii. p. 573, ΠΟΛΙΤΙΚΩι συλλογισμω—a Civil or Oratorical fyllogism, as opposed to the strict dialectic fyllogism: a distinction which he presently after expresses by, ἀκριβεςερον, and ΜΑΛΑΚΩΤΕΡΟΝ, συλλογιζεσθαι [ibid.] And thus, here, the same term, πολιτικως, is used, to distinguish the popular, and less laboured, though more solid, eloquence of the Senate or the Forum, from the studied and declamatory composition of the prosessed rhetoricians. A similar use of the word occurs in the passage quoted in NOTE 229, from the Euagoras of Isocrates, where, ἐνομασι ΠΟΛΙ-ΤΙΚΟΙΣ, is plainly synonymous with ἐνομασι ΚΥΡΙΟΙΣ. See also Dion. Halicarn. De Struct. Orat. p. 4. cd. Upton, and Faber's note.

That Aristotle, however, by Politics (ή πολιτικη), means only, as Dacier asserts, "l'usage commun, le language ordinaire des peuples," cannot, surely, be admitted. The force and extent of the term is well known". "Civilis scientia," says Quintilian, "idem quod sapientia est"." It comprehended all the necessary knowledge of the Πολιτικώ, the vir civilis, the public man. It included, of course, eloquence, or the faculty of public speaking, but that, of a kind very different from the "umbratile genus," as Cicero calls it, of the rhetorical schools. What Aristotle says of the ² See Eth. Nicom. lib. i. cap. ii. and iii. and Mag. Moral. lib. i. cap. i.

b Lib. ii. cap. xv. p. 106. ed. Gibf.

^c Cic. de Or. ii. 15 to 19. where he traces the feparation of elequence from philofophy. The difference of the political and rhetorical styles may be well illustrated, I think, the old Tragic Poets, that they made their personages speak like such a man, not like a Rhetorician, cannot be better illustrated than by Quintilian's character of Euripides. "Illud quidem nemo "non sateatur necesse est, iis qui se ad azendum comparent, utili"orem longe Euripidem sore. Namque is, et in sermone—

"magis accedit oratorio generi, et sententiis densus; et in iis que "à sapientibus tradita sunt, penè ipsis par, et in dicendo ac respon"dendo cuilibet corum qui fuerunt in foro diserti comparandus."
[lib. x. cap. i.]

That Dacier, with fo precise and clear an expression before his eyes, as, EHOIOTN λεγοντας, should understand this of the antient orators, and roundly pronounce Victorius to be mistaken in applying it to the Poets, seems perfectly unaccountable.

I do not fee in this passage any foundation for the refinement of Castelvetro, Dacier, and other commentators, who refer the ἐνοντα to the political science, and the ἀρμοττοντα to rhetoric. The word ἀρμοττοντα, has, I think, the same sense as in cap. xv. and means, such sentiments, or thoughts, as, being adapted to the person speaking, are expressive of the manners: for it is in this view, as I before remarked, that Aristotle is here considering the sentiments, or Διανοία. Τα ἐνοντα, as Victorius has observed, is equivalent to τα ὑπαρχοντα; and it was clearly the business of rhetoric (ἐητορικης ἐργον,) to teach both the ὑπαρχοντα and the άρμοτ-τοντα. See Rhet. lib. ii. cap. xxii. p. 573, E. and lib. iii. cap. vii. p. 590, D. cd. Duval.

I think, by a comparison of the style of Cicero, (in his Orations,) with that of Demosthenes: for on this subject, I cannot but agree with the remarks of Lord Monboddo, Orig. and Prog. of Lang. vol. iii. p. 184, and vol. ii. Diff. III.

N O T E 58.

P. 78. THERE ARE SPEECHES, THEREFORE, WHICH ARE WITHOUT MANNERS----AS NOT CONTAINING, &c.

The reading I have followed is, I think, fully authorised, by MSS. and by common sense.—See Mr. Winstanley's note, p. 282.

—The Abbé Batteux has given the passage thus, from a MS. (N° 2117,) in the King of France's library. Εςι δε ήθω μεν το τοιμτον, ὁ δηλοι την προαιρεσιν, ὁποια τις ἐςιν διοπες ἐκ ἐχμσιν ήθω ἐνιοι των λογων, ἐν ὁις ἐκ ἐςι δηλον ὁτι προαιρειται ή φευγει ὁ λεγων.

The common reading stands thus: - Est de ville men to toleton, ό δηλοι την προαιρεσιν, όποια τις έςιν, εν όις εκ έςι δηλον, ή προαιρειται, η Φευγει ο λεγων. διοπερ εκ έχεσιν ήθω ένιοι των λογων. — Which is thus rendered by Mr. Harris: "Manners or Character " is that which discovers WHAT THE DETERMINATION of a "fpeaker] will be, in matters, where IT IS NOT YET MANIFEST, " whether he chuses to do a thing, or to avoid it "." Now if this were true, I do not fee how there could be any \(\eta/\eta_0\), in any play, after the first discovery of the speaker's character. In the Avare of Moliere, for instance, it is sufficiently manifest from the very first fcene in which Harpagon appears, what his avariee will lead him to chuse or to avoid, in any circumstance of the drama. Is there, for that reason, no ill, no fentiments that mark his character, in any thing he fays during the rest of the play?—Nay, more; according to this reading, there can be no η at all in any part of that drama: for the προαιρεσις or propenfity of the Mifer is completely known to every reader or fpectator from the very title of the piece.

I know, indeed, that Le Bossu, and others, have given a meaning to this passage, by making Aristotle say, what he certainly does not say—viz. when it is not yet manifest " en indicio dicentis," what the will, or choice, of the speaker is b. But if the common reading were right, we might, surely, expect to find the words, ἐν ὁις ἐν ἐςι δηλον, &c. subjoined in other places where he defines the ἢθ. Yet we have nothing like it in cap. xv. initio; nor in the second book of his Rhetoric, where he says only, ἢτων δονοις δηλη ἡ προαιφεσις c: nor in other passages of the same work, relative to the same subject.

² The words—την προαιρεσιν δποια τις εκιν, are not, I think, rendered with Mr. Harris's usual accuracy,—" what the determination of a speaker will be." Προαιρεσις, here, is not particular determination, but that habitual and general properfity which is the cause of particular determinations.

Piccolomini's translation agrees with mine, and is expressed with his usual accuracy.—" Ma il costume nel parlar' é quello, " il quale mostra suora, è apparir sà il volere, et l'elettion di chi " parla. Peroche alcuni parlari si truovano, li quali non hanno " costume; come ch' in essi non appaia, et non si manifesti, quello, " che ò elegga, ò sugga, con la sua volontà, chi parla."

N O T E 59.

P. 78. A BEGINNING, IS THAT, &c.

See Harris, Philol. Inq. Part II. ch. v. These definitions must be understood wholly to refer to the wants, and expectations, of the spectator. He must want nothing before the beginning, nor expect any thing after the end. Nothing, however, is more common than both these defects; than perplexed beginnings, and unsatisfactory conclusions. Henry Fielding, we are told, used "to execrate the man who invented fifth acts"." The inventor of first acts has not given dramatic Poets much less trouble. Most modern plays have, I think, more or less of this intricacy in their beginnings; but it is especially the case with Comedy. It b Heinflus De Trag. Conft. cap. xiv. Le Bossu, Du Poeme Epique, livre iv. ch. 4.

Cap. axi. p. 572. E.

Harris, Phil. Inq. p. 161.

feems, indeed, by no means easy for a modern comic writer, of whom invention, novelty, variety of incidents, and ingenuity of contrivance, are required, deval, as Aristotle well expresses it, worked it, the pestator's hand." The spectator, and even the reader, of a new Comedy, is generally employed, during the first scenes, in guessing an anigma; and when, at length, he comprehends what is going forward, his attention, interest, and sympathy, are disturbed and distracted, by looking back, to understand what he should have understood at first. Hence the advantage which the Tragic Poet, from the notoriety of his subjects, generally possesses over the Comic; and which is so pleasantly described in the fragment preserved by Athenaus from Antiphanes or Aristophanes, that I shall save the reader the trouble of turning to it.

— Μακαριον ές ιν ή Τραγωδία Ποιημα κατα παντ' είγε πρωτον οι λογοι Υπο των θεατων είσιν έγνωρισμενοι Πριν και τιν' είπειν, ώς ύπομνησαι μονον Δει τον ποιητην. Οιδιπεν γαρ αν γε φω, Τα δ' άλλα παντ' ισασιν'— ο πατηρ Λαίω, Μητηρ Ιοκαςη—θυγατερες, παιδες, τινες'— Τι πεισεθ' έτω, τι πεποιηκεν' — αν παλιν Ειτη τις Αλκμαιωνα, και τα παιδια Παντ' ευθυς είρηκεν— οτι μανεις απεκτονε Την μητερα.—

Ημιν δε ταυτ' εκ έςιν' άλλα παντα δει Ευραν, διοματα καινα, τα διωπημενα Προτερον, τα νυν παροντα, την καταςροφην. Την έσβολην' άν έν τι τετων παραλιπη Χρεμης τις, ή Φειδων τις, έκσυριττεται, ΠΗΛΕΙ δε ταυτ' έξεστι και ΤΕΥΚΡΩ: ποιεν.

b Scc Note 40. c Athen. lib. vi. See Cajcalor, in locum.

Thus rendered by Grotius -

— — Scilicet Tragædia
Felix poema est: nam principio cognitum
Argumentum omne spectatori est, antequam
Verbum hiscat aliquis: nomen tantum dicere
Poetæ satis est. Oedipum præscripsero,
Jam reliqua per se norunt; pater est Laïus,
Jocasta mater; tum qui nati et filiæ,
Quid secit, quid patietur. Si promiserit Alcmæona alius, ipsi dicent pueruli,
"Hic ille est qui intersecit matrem insaniens."—

At nobis ista non licent, sed omnia Sunt invenienda, nomina imprimis nova, Res antegestæ, res præsentes, exitus, Initia. Ex illis siqua pars desecerit, Exsibilatur Phido, sive ille est Chremes; Illa alia sacere Pelco et Teucro licet.

When the middle of a drama is not fufficiently connected with what precedes,—that is, in Aristotle's language, when it is not, auto μετ' αλλο,—a new plot seems to begin: a fault not uncommon in double and complicated fables. If, on the other hand, it wants the μετ' ἐμεινο ἐτερον, the piece seems finished before its time. The Sampson Agonistes of Milton, according to Dr. Johnson, is deficient in both requisites of a true, Aristotelic middle. Its "in-" termediate parts have neither cause nor consequence, neither hasten "nor retard the catastrophes." The criticism appears to be just.

d Excerpta ex Trag. et Com. Græcis, p. 622.

[©] Qu'y a-t-il de plus adroit que la maniere dont Terence a entrelacè les amours de Pamphile et de Charinus dans l'Andrienne? Cependant l'a-t-il fait suns inconvénient?—Au commencement du second acte, ne eroiroit-on pas entrer dans une autre piece? Diderot, De la Pees. Dram. p. 283.

Life of Milton.

It is feldom, however, that a beginning, a middle, or an end, is defective in both the conditions required. A beginning, which, strictly speaking, did not naturally require any thing to follow it, (μετ' ἐκεινο ἐτερον πεφυκεν ἐιναι,) would put even the most attentive spectator into the situation of Shakspeare's drowsy tinker:

Sly. A goodly matter, furely.—Comes there any more of it? Page. My Lord, 'tis but begun's.

The most usual defects, and which, I suppose, Aristotle had principally in view, are those of beginnings which do not properly, in his sense, begin, and of endings which do not end. The first perplex us, by supposing something to have preceded, without clearly telling us what; the other leave us distaissied, by disappointing our natural expectations of something more to follow. Of this last fault, instances may be found in abundance; particularly in the conclusions of Shakspeare. In Plantus, and even in Terence, we find this imperfection supplied by a very simple and clumsy contrivance, that, of informing the audience that the play was over, and telling them in what manner they were to suppose the catastrophe completed.

Spectatores, Fabula bæc eft acta: vos plaufum date.

Plant. Moftel.

Spectatores, quod futurum est intus, hic memorabimus. Hæc Casina hujus reperietur filia esse è proxumo; Eaque nubet Euthynico nostro herili filio.

Id. in fine Cafinæ,

Ne expectetis dum exeant huc: intus despondebitur; Intus transigetur, si quid est quod restat.

Ter. And.

^{*} Taming of the Shrew.

h See Dr. Johnson's Preface to Shakspeare, p. 16. There cannot be a stronger proof of Shakspeare's haste in the conclusion of his plays, than his passing over in total silence the interesting character of old Adam, at the end of As yet like it, a defect felt, I believe, by every spectator and every reader of that charming comed:

The fault opposite to this—that, of prolonging the piece beyoud the point of fatisfactory conclusion—has been attributed to the Ordipus Tyrannus of Sophocles. The criticism is tasteless, on every account. The reader may fee it well confuted by Brumoy. But one of his answers is alone sufficient, on the principles of Aciftotle: "Le spectateur en effet servit-il content s'il ignoroit le fort " de Jocatte, d'Oedipe, et de sa famille?" &cc. " Oedipus," says Voltaire, " is fully acquainted with his fate at the end of the fourth " act. Voila donc la piece finie "."—He might have learned better criticism from a writer of far inferior abilities. " Il faut ausli " prendre garde que la catastrophe achéve pleinement le Poeme " dramatique; c'est à dire, qu'il ne reste rien aprés, ou de ce que " les spectateurs doivent sçavoir, ou qu'ils vueillent entendre; car " s'ils ont raifon de demander, Qu'est devenu quelque personnage "interesse dans les grandes intrigues du Theatre, ou s'ils ont juste " fujet de sçavoir, Quels sont les sentimens de quelq'un des principaux " acteurs aprés le dernier evenement qui fait cette catastrophe,-la " piece n'est pas sinie, il y manque encore un dernier trait'." That is to fay, in Aristotle's language, a drama so concluded, (as the Oedipus Tyrannus would be, if it ended with the fourth act,) would want the true τελευτη, or end—that, after which, αλλο εδεν ΠΕΦΥΚΕΝ έιναι.

i Theatre des Grecs, i. 376.

k Critique sur l'Oedipe de Sophoele.

¹ D'Aubignac, Pratique du Theatre, tom. i. p. 126. This author, though neither a good writer, nor a deep scholar, has collected in this book a good deal of curious theatrical crudition, and made some acute and judicious observations on the rules of dramatic writing. He was unfortunate when he attempted to put his theory into practice by writing a Tragedy. "Je sçais bon gré," said the great Condé, "à l'Abbé "D'Aubignac d'avoir suivi les regles d'Aristote, mais je ne pardonne pas aux regles "d'Aristote, d'avoir sait saire une si mauvaise Tragedie à l'Abbé D'Aubignac."

N O T E 60.

P. 79. WHETHER IT BE AN ANIMAL, &c.

Αλλα τοδε γε διμαι σε φαναι αν δειν, παντα λογον Ω ΣΠΕΡ ΖΩΟΝ συνεςαναι, σωμα τι έχοντα αυτον άυτε ώς ε μητε ΑΚΕΦΑΛΟΝ είναι μητε ΑΠΟΥΝ, αλλα ΜΕΣΑ τε έχειν, και ΑΚΡΑ, πρεποντα αλληλοις και τω Ω ΛΩι——.

Plato, in Phædro, p. 264, ed. Ser.

N O T E 61.

P. 79. BEAUTY CONSISTS IN MAGNITUDE AND ORDER.

There is fomething fingular, fomething, at least, not quite confonant to modern ideas, in the great stress which the antients appear to have laid upon fixe, as a necessary constituent of beauty in the human form. They seem, indeed, to have despised every thing that was not large; and to have estimated beauty, not by measure only, but by weight also. "Magnanimity," says the Philosopher in his Ethics, "consists in greatness of soul, as "beauty also consists in greatness of soul, as called again, and supperger, pretty, and well-shaped, but not KAAOI, "bandsome, or beautiful"."

That magnitude should have entered, as essential, into their idea of a handsome man, is not surprising. The utility of strength, and the connection between strength and size, is sufficient to account for this. But what appears most singular is, that they insist no less upon the importance of magnitude to sende beauty.

^{*} Ethic. Nicom. lib. iv. cap. 3.

—ΘΗΛΕΙΩΝ δε άρετη, σωματω μεν, καλλω και ΜΕΓΕΘΟΣω. Homer feldom omits fize in his defcriptions of this kind.

Εσκε δε πατς εμοιο γυνη Φοινισσ' ένι δικω, Καλη τε ΜΕΓΑΛΗ τε, και άγλαα έογ' είδυϊα.

Od. O. 416.

Nor let it be objected, that this praise comes from a swine-herd; for Eurymachus, a suitor, and a courtier, compliments Penelope, by telling her, that she was more accomplished in mind, bandsomer, and LARGER, than other women:

---- ἐπει περιεσσι γυναικων Ειδ©- τε, ΜΕΓΕΘΟΣ τε, ίδε φρενας ἐνδον ἐίσας.

Od. S. 248.

And, indeed, when Minerva, that Penelope might fascinate the suitors, anointed her with the cosmetic wash of Venus, and gave a supernatural heightening to all her charms, at the same time that she made her skin "wbiter than ivory," she made her also "taller and stouter."

Ibid. 190.

Thus, too, of the daughters of Pandarus:

Ήρη δ' αυτητιν περι πασεων δωκε γυναικων Ειδώ και πηυτην, ΜΗΚΟΣ δ' έπορ' Αρτεμις άγιη.

Od. o. 6.

When Penelope, in the beginning of the twenty-first book, goes to fetch the key of the repository, where the bow of Ulysses was kept, Homer describes her as taking hold of the key with her "fout band:"

Rhet. i. eap. v.—Xenophon, deferibing Panthea, fays—ληνεγκε—πρωτον μει, ΜΕΓΕΘΕΙ, έπειτα δε, τη ΡΩΜΠε, &c. Cyropad. lib. v. initio.

Έιλετο δε κληιδ' ευκαμπεα ΧΕΙΡΙ ΠΑΧΕΙΗι.

Od. o. 6.

—which Ernestus, who allows, that, "manu crassa, non benè convenit "feminæ pulchræ et reginæ," would fain soften down into the main potelée of the French.

Quintilian observes of Zeuxis, who drew the heads and limbs of his figures very large, that, in this, he followed Homer, "cui" validissima quæque forma, etiam in fæminis, placet;" and, that he did this, "id amplius atque angustius ratus": and, indeed, these ideas of the antients relative to beauty, both male and semale, seem to have been owing, in part, at least, to their ideas of that majesty and dignity, which they considered as essential attributes of their divinities, and which imply superior size and strength. To tell a lady that she was taller and stouter than most of her sex, was a great compliment: it was comparing her to a goddess.

It feems, then, that Shakspeare, in the quarrel between Helena and Hermia in his Midsiummer Night's Dream, has, without knowing it, made Hermia perfectly classical in her resentment, and Lysander, in his reproaches:

Her. Puppet! Why so?—Ay, that way goes the game. Now I perceive that she hath made compare Between our flatures; she hath urged her beight, And with her personage, her tall personage, Her beight, forsooth, she hath prevail'd with him.

Her. Little again?—nothing but low and little? Why will you fuffer her to flout me thus? Let me come to her.——

Lyf. Get you gone, you dwarf,
You minimus of hind'ring knot-grass made,
You bead, you acorn!——

Att iii. Scene 8.

4 XII. 10.

N O T E 62.

P. 79. No very minute animal can be beautiful--nor one of a prodictious size.

I am by no means perfectly fatisfied of the integrity of this passage; but no better comment can, I think, be given upon it, as it stands, than that of Beni.—" Mon priora [i. e. quæ valdè "pusilla,] quia eorum spectatio [θεωοια] momento penè temporis "fiat, ac propterea spectatio ipsa confundatur;—quod est, tantâ "celeritate comprehendantur ac veluti absorbeantur partes omnes, "ut non liceat partem à parte, ut caput à thorace, internoscere, atque adeo partes conferre mutuò, symmetriamque et proportionem agnoscere et astimare.—Non posteriora, [i. e. valdè magna,] quia, "è contrario, in tam ingenti mole ac magnitudine, partium mul- titudo cognitionem impediat, quæ non possit simul [âμα] haberi: "dum enim spectatur una, propter distantiam deperit et evanescit [âl- μεται] cognitio alterius; ita ut unum et totum non appareat animal." [Benii Comm. in Aristot. Poet. p. 205.]

The reader may, after this, be amused with seeing what strange work Lord Shaftsbury has made with this passage in his explanatory translation of it. Essay on the freedom of Wit and Humour. Part IV. Sect. 3.

N O T E 63.

P. So. Easily compressended by the eye, &c.

EΥΣΥΝΟΠΤΟΝ—No words furnish a more striking proof of the richness, compression, force, and convenience, of the Greek language, than those which Aristotle here uses;— ἐυσυνοπτον, ἐυμνημονευτον, μνημονευτον, συνδηλ. The reader needs only fee to what a feeble length of periphraftic wire-drawing a translator is reduced, if he would give their full value: Eafily comprehended by the eye.—" Que " l'æil puisse comprendre et mesurer aisement et tout d'un coup." [Dacier.] " Qui puisse être saisi d'un même coup d'æil." [Batteux; the most compressed of all Aristotle's translators.] " Un tout en-" semble où la vue ne s'égare point." [Marmontel, Poetique Fr. Pref.]

Of the same kind are the words, ευεπαπολεθητον—" such as the "understanding can easily follow and keep up with '' ευαναπνευς ⑤,— of a period, "that does not put one out of breath".

N O T E 64.

P. 80. IF A HUNDRED TRAGEDIES &c.

The supposition of a bundred Tragedies performed in concurrence seems merely to be a fort of hyperbolical sling at the known intemperance of the Athenian people with respect to theatrical exhibitions; and Dacier has rightly, I think, accounted for this exuberantia orationis, as Victorius calls it.

But Dacier, and the Abbé Batteux after him, make Aristotle's expression too hyperbolical for hyperbole itself, when they translate, "S'il falloit jouer cent Tragedies en un jour." For if the Tragedies were only half an hour long, and played without intermission, they would have required a day of fifty hours. We must understand, surely, with Beni, "Si centum Tragedie, verbi gratia, "totis illis spectaculorum diebus recitandæ proponerentur"; which will still leave hyperbole enough.

a Rhet. I. ii. p. 517. b Ibid. III. ix. p. 592.

M m 2

Dacier

 $^{^{\}circ}$ Quis enim non intelligit hanc (i. e. ἐκατον Τραγρδίας) exuberantiam orationis $_{\circ}$ effe? Vist. in locum.

d Comment. p. 211.

Dacier is also mistaken, I believe, in concluding, from what Aristotle says, that it was once an established custom with the Greeks to regulate the length of Tragedies by the clepsydra, or hour-glass. His expression seems to imply at least, that it had been rarely practised, if it does not, as M. Batteux thinks, imply some doubt, whether it had been done at all:—ωσπες ποτε και ἀλλοτε ΦΑΣΙ.

Thus much, however, as to the limited length of these performances, we may easily conceive; that when, to gratify the immoderate sondness of the Athenians for the drama, an uncommon number of Tragedies were exhibited in concurrence, and the contending Poets were apt to encroach upon the patience of the audience, by lengthening out their pieces in order to shew off themselves, or their actors, the Lord Chamberlain of these exhibitions might be obliged, in compliance with the clamours of the people, to confine the representation of each drama to some limited time.

N O T E 65.

P. So. A FABLE IS NOT ONE----MERELY BECAUSE THE HERO OF IT IS ONE.

Mr. Hume, in his Essay on the association of ideas, represents this passage of Aristotle as contrary to the doctrine he there lays down, and which is unquestionably true—that "in all productions, as well as in the Epic and Tragic, a certain unity is re"quired," &c.—and, "that the unity of action which is to be "found in biography or history, differs from that of Epic Poetry, not in kind, but in degree." I see here no contrariety at all. Aristotle certainly did not mean to say, that a biographical Poem, if I may so term it, (a Poem $\pi \epsilon \rho \iota \epsilon \nu \alpha$,) has no unity, no relation of cause and effect, &c. to connect the incidents; but only, that it has not that degree of unity, which is requisite for the purpose of e See cap. ix. Transl. Part II. Seel. 7.

Tragic, or even Epic, Poetry. Mr. Hume himself allows, that Poetry "requires a stricter and closer unity in the sable;" and this is all that Aristotle appears to mean. The persons censured by him for concluding, that, "because Hercules was one, so also "must be the sable, of which he was the subject," were right enough, as philosophers, but as poets, certainly wrong.

This chapter, in which Aristotle considers so particularly the unity of sable, as distinct from its totality, led me once to think it probable, that the word μιας was originally in the definition of Tragedy, cap. vi. as we find it afterwards in cap. xxiii.—περι ΜΙΑΝ πραξιν όλην και τελειαν. But perhaps the supposition is unnecessary, and unity may be sufficiently implied in the words τελειας και όλης: ΌΛΟΤΗΤΟΣ, as he elsewhere says, ΈΝΟΤΗΤΟΣ ΤΙΝΟΣ ΌΥΣΗΣ. Metaph. lib. v. cap. 26.

NOTE 66.

P. 80. EITHER FROM ART, OR GENIUS.

Hτοι δια τεχνην, Η ΔΙΑ ΦΥΣΙΝ.—It appears from this, as well as from other passages of Aristotle's treatise, that in the midst of all the coldness of philosophical investigation and analysis, he never lost sight of the difference between that spontaneous operation of genius and feeling in the Poet, which produces poetic beauty, and the slow and cautious process of calm examination and inquiry in the Critic, whose business it is to discover its principles. It is not every philosophical critic that avoids this error. Nothing is more common, than to suppose that to have been produced by art and restection, about which, when produced, art and restection have been employed. Thus languages, we are told, must have been originally formed by art, because they cannot be analysed without art:

Grammarians and Philosophers must have formed language, because language has formed Grammarians and Philosophers.

N O T E 67.

P. 81. BUT HE COMPREHENDED THOSE ONLY WHICH HAVE RELATION TO ONE ACTION, &c.

Οδυσσειαν γαρ ποιων, εκ εποιησεν άπαντα όσα αυτώ συνεξη -- ΑΛΛ' Α περι μιαν πραξίν, διών λεγομεν την Οδυσσειαν, ΣΥΝΕΣΤΗΣΑΝ. So the text stands. "Non cecinit omnia---fed quæ circa unam solam actio-"nem, qualem Odysseam dicinus, constiterunt." [Goulston.] Victorius reads, AAAA, and SYNESTHSEN; but does injustice, I think, to his own reading, by his construction and his version: περι μιαν πραξινσυνεςησεν: " circa unam actionem—MANSIT." This is, furely, very harsh. I should punctuate, and translate, thus: - αλλα περι μιαν πράξιν, διαν λεγομεν, την Οδυσσειαν συνεςησεν· δμοιως δε και την Ιλιαδα. [fc. συνεςησεν]. "Sed circa unam actionem, qualem dicimus, Odysseam con-" flicuit; pariterque Iliadem."-" But he planned his Odyffey, as " he also did his Iliad, upon an action, that is one, in the fense here "explained."—And that this is the true reading, and the true fense, of the passage, I was once thoroughly persuaded. ftruction of the whole is, thus, clear and natural. The circumflance of the plural verb συνεςησαν with the plural neuter, a, is avoided; and the word συνεςηπεν retains its proper and usual sense, as applied, throughout, by Aristotle, to the composition, or con-Aruction, of the Fable.—So, cap. ix. συζησωντές τον μυθον. cap. xvii. and xxiii.—τες μυθες συνιςαναι—et passim. I will not, however, diffemble what is against me. The reading all a, besides its support from MSS. answers better to the άπαντα ίσα, which precedes: — τουπ εποιησεν ΑΠΑΝΤΑ όσα αυτώ συνεξη---ΑΛΛ' Α περι μ. π. &c. But, if ἀλλ' ά be retained, the passage, I think, should stand thus: - αλλ' α περι μιαν πραξιν, [fc. ες:,] διαν λεγομεν την Οδυσσειαν, ΣΥΝΕΣΤΗΣΕΝ.

ΣΥΝΕΣΤΗΣΕΝ^a. According to the construction of Piccolomini:—quelle cose accolse, ch' al corpo d'una attione, la qual chiamiamo Odissea, servissero:—and the Abbé Batteux—" Il a rapproché tout ce qui tenoit à une seule action."—συνεςησεν ὰ περι μιαν πραξιν: i. c. composed his fable of those circumstances only, which relate to one action. Thus, immediately after—τα ΜΕΡΗ ΣΥΝΙΣΤΑΝΑΙ των πραγματων.

Unwilling to make alterations that do not appear absolutely necessary, I have sollowed this last reading; though with some remaining partiality to my first conjecture. That the sense would be clearer, and the construction less elliptical and embarrassed, is certain. But I am assaid this is but a questionable proof of corruption in the writings of Aristotle.

N O T E 68.

P. 31. THE WHOLE WILL BE DESTROYED, OR CHANGED.

Destroyed, if any part be taken away, (ataugeness)—disturbed or changed, if it be transposed (netatibeness). In the first case it will be no longer a whole; in the last, not the same whole. This seems the meaning, as it is well rendered by M. Batteux: "Que les "parties en soient tellement liées entre elles, qu'une seule tran"sposée, ou retranchée, ce ne soit plus un tout, ou le même and his version. His text stands thus: ἀλλα πεςι μιαν πραξικ, διαν λεγομεν την Οδοσσιαν, συνεσισιν. His version is—" Verum circa unam actionem, qualem dicimus Odysleam "mansit."—But, in his remarks, he translates cractly as if he had read and understood the passage in the way here proposed. "Verum quæ circa unam actionem, "qualem Odysseam vocamus, constituit."—And, "Quæ circa unam, autem, retionem "coagmentasse inquit Homerum."—Again—" Quare verè dici potest, ipsum complexum fuisse, quæ circa illam assionem." Nor does he give, in his complexus, any other version, or explanation, or mention a word about the change of ἀρχί α τι το ἐννα, which he had adopted in his text.

"tout."—But I cannot think διαφερεσθαι right. It is rendered by Goulston, "diversum reddatur, et moveatur, totum." So Picco-Iomini, "diverso----e mutato," &c. But, besides the manifest tautology, I doubt whether there be any good authority for this sense of the verb διαφερεσθαι—i. e. to be made different, or changed. At least I have not found any instance of it in Aristotle's writings. If we retain διαφερεσθαι, it must, I think, be taken in the sense of discerpi, distrahi, &c. But I am almost persuaded, that Aristotle wrote ΔΙΑΦΘΕΙΡΕΣΘΑΙ, spoiled, or destroyed. So in his Topics, ΦΘΕΙΡΕΣΘΑΙ το ΌΛΟΝ. vol. i. p. 258. B. cd. Duval.

N O T E 69.

P. 82. Possible, According to probable, or necessary, consequence.

Compare cap. xv. Xon δε και έν τοις ήθεσιν. κ. τ. αλ. [Transl. Part II. Sect. 15. p. 93.] The expression, δυνατα κατα—το αναγκαιον, " possible --- according to necessity," appears strange at the first glance: but in fiction, events may be fupposed to happen, as in real life they do happen, not only probably, but necessarily; that is, not only as they were likely to happen, but as, morally speaking, they could not but happen.—" Puisque la fonction du vraisem-" blable dans la Tragedie, est d'empêcher l'esprit de s'appercevoir " de la feinte, le vraisemblable qui le trompe le mieux est le plus " parfait, et c'est celui qui devient necessaire. Un caractere etant " supposé, il y a des effets qu'il doit necessairement produire, et "d'autres qu'il peut produire, ou ne produire pas." Again—" La " perfection est de faire agir les personnages, de maniere qu'ils " n'ayent pas pu agir autrement, leur caractere supposé," &c. Thus Fontenelle, in his excellent Reflexions sur la Poetique; in several parts of which, that clear and philosophical writer has, I believe without without any fuch intention, coincided with, and illustrated, the positions of Aristotle.—See particularly, Sect. 58, to 65, inclusively.

N O T E 70.

P. 82. A SPECIES OF HISTORY—.

'Isoqua TIΣ—" a fort of history." It is singular, that almost all the translators should have neglected a word so important as the pronoun is in this passage. May we not infer from this expression, that if Aristotle had been asked, whether an Epic imitation in prose would be a Poem, or not, he would have allowed it to be, ποσημα TI, a kind of Poem, as having the essence of Poetry, invention and imitation? See NOTE v. p. 153.

N O T E 71.

P. 82. A MORE EXCELLENT THING THAN HISTORY.

Σπεδαιοτέρου. It means no more than, in plain English, a better thing. The word occurs frequently in Aristotle's works, in this general sense. So, Rhet. I. vii. p. 528, B. και ών ἀι ἐπιξημαι καλλισς ἢ σπεδαιοτέραι, και τα πραγματα καλλιω και σπεδαιοτέρα.—And, ibid. I. ix. p. 531, E. Και ἀι των φυσει σπεδαιοτέρων (fuperior by nature) ἀρεται καλλιες, και τα ἐργα ὁ διεν ἀνδρω [sc. σπεδαιοτέραι ἀι ἀρεται, &c.] ἢ γυναικω.—See, also, Ethic. Nicom. lib. vi. cap. vii. p. 78, C. ἀτοπον γαρ ἐι τις την ἐπιξημην πολιτικήν——ΣΠΟΥΔΑΙΟΤΑΤΗΝ διεται ἐιναι, ἐι μη το ΑΡΙΣΤΟΝ των ἐν τω κοσμω ἀνθρωωω ἐςι.

Dacier translates the word, "morale;" Batteux, "instructive;" but this is rather giving the reason why it is σωνδαιοτερού, or, a superior thing.

NOTE

N O T E 72.

P. 82. Is NOT, LIKE THE IAMBIC POETS, PARTICULAR AND PERSONAL.

Ιαμβοωσιοι.—Strictly, the writers of the ψογοι or fatirical invectives that preceded Comedy. [See cap. iv. Transl. Part I. Sect. 6.] But I believe Aristotle meant here to include, at least, the authors of the first rude Comedy, " of the Iambic form—" της ἰαμβικης ίδεας. See cap. v. Transl. Part I. Sect. 8.

It appears, that the Poem called Iaμε, whatever it was, was represented, or acted, as well as Tragedy and the Epic: for, in his feventh book De Rep. cap. xvii. the philosopher forbids boys to be spectators of Iambi and Comedies:—τες δε νεωτερες ἐτ᾽ IAMBΩN, ἐτε κωμωδίας ΘΕΑΤΑΣ νομοθετητεον, προν ης—κ. τ. αλ. p. 448, Ε.

N O T E 73.

P. 82. WHAT HAS NEVER ACTUALLY HAPPENED, WE ARE NOT APT TO REGARD AS POSSIBLE.

This must be restricted to those extraordinary actions and events, of public and elevated personages, which usually make the subject of Tragedy. The best comment I have seen, or that, I think, can be given, on this passage, is that of Piccolomini; but it is so long, that I can only refer to it ". We have, however, the substance of it in the following observation of Brumoy.—" La Tragedie ne "s'est point sous-divisée" (as Comedy, he observes, had been,) "en "Tragedie reelle, et Tragedie de pure imagination. Je crois en "trouver la raison dans la nature de l'esprit humain. Il n'y a que

" la vraisemblance dont il puisse être touché. Or il n'est pas vrai" semblable que des saits aussi grands que ceux de la Tragedie, des
" faits qui n'arrivent que dans les maisons des rois, ou dans le sein
" des empires, soient absolument inconnus. Si donc le Poete in" vente tout son sujet, jusq' aux noms, l'esprit du spectateur se
" revolte; tout lui paroit incroyable, et la piece manque son esset, " faute de vraisemblance. Mais comme la Comedie ne touche que " la vie commune et ses ridicules, le spectateur peut supposer et " suppose en esset, en se laissant aller à l'enchantement du spectacle,
" que le sujet qu'on lui présente est un fait réel, quoiqu' il ne le " connoisse pas. Il n'en séroit pas de même, si le sujet comique avoit " du merveilleux"."

N O T E 74.

P. 83. A POET SHOULD BE A POET OR MAKER OF FABLES, RATHER THAN OF VERSES.

So Plato, almost in the same words:— $\dot{\epsilon}$ υνοησας ότι τον $\dot{\omega}$ οιητην δεοι, $\dot{\epsilon}$ ι $\dot{\omega}$ ερ μελλοι $\dot{\omega}$ οιητης $\dot{\epsilon}$ ιναι, $\dot{\omega}$ οιείν ΜΥΘΟΥΣ, $\dot{\alpha}$ λλ' $\dot{\epsilon}$ ΛΟΓΟΥΣ.— Phædon, p. 61, ed. Serr.

N O T E 75.

P. 83. Nor is he the less a Poet, though the incidents of his fable should chance to be such as have really happened, &c.

The original, as it stands, (for I doubt of its integrity,) is very ambiguous and obscure. The sense I wished to give it, is this:
"Nor will he be the less a Poet, though he should found his Poem b Theatre des Grecs, i. p. 207.

"upon fact: for nothing hinders, but that some real events may be such, as to admit of Poetic probability; and he who gives them this probability, and makes them such, as Poetry requires, is so far entitled to the name of Poet, or Inventor."

The expression— ἀν ΣΥΜΒΗι γενομενα ποιενν,— " if he should " happen," &c. is very strong, and hardly applicable to a Poet chusing a true story for the outline of his sable. It indicates accidental coincidence with truth. The word ἐνναι, also, is on the same side:—" may be," does not suit the sense above given, which requires, "may become"—may be made such by the Poet; not, "may be such," in themselves, which is the obvious meaning of τοιαυτα ΕΙΝΑΙ. Farther; Aristotle has just told us, that probability is the Poet's province, and yet, at the same time, that Tragedies were usually sounded, and should, in general, be sounded, on historical fatt. Now it would, surely, be rather strange, after all this, to say, "nothing binders, but that some real events may be "made to have poetic probability:"—ἐδεν ΚΩΛΥΕΙ τοιαυτα ἐιναι ὁ.α ἀν ἐινῶν γενεσθαι, κ. τ. αλ.—

But, to the interpretation which I have preferred, these expressions are all exactly suitable, and the meaning and connection of the whole seems to be this:—Aristotle had been opposing Poetry to fall: he had said expressly, that the yevomeva were the peculiar province of the historian; the oix an yeverto, and the eix 3, of the Poet. An objector, misapprehending, or misrepresenting, his meaning, might have urged—" the incidents of this or that Poet " have actually happened; they are yevopeva; and therefore, ac-"cording to your own doctrine, not proper for Poetry, nor the "work of a Poet."—To this Aristotle answers, that, though the object of the Poet be not truth, yet his invented probabilities may coincide with truth: and real events, even of the Tragic and extraordinary kind, may have happened as probably and naturally as he has supposed them to happen. He is still, therefore, no less a Poet; not only as having actually invented the incidents, but as having invented them with true Poetic probability.—And thus Victorius:—" Non omnes eos—qui fortuitò incidant in res que " exitum jam habuerint, in culpâ esse; quia fieri possit, ut res " aliquæ factæ, ita factæ sint, ut verisimile sit illas sactas esse; et " esse denique ejusmodi, ut effici potuerint; quo nomine (inquit,) "ille Poeta eorum aliquo modo est: officium enim Poetæ est, ve-"rifimile fectari, et ea quæ effici possunt sumere: quod in illis " rebus illo modo factis non desideratur. Retinet igitur, hâc de causa, nomen Poetæ." I confess, indeed, that the passage is, in this way, nothing more than an answer to a senseless cavil. But fuch cavils, we know, the fophists of those times b did not disdain to make, nor Aristotle always disdain to answer. See cap. xxv. Transl. Part IV.

N O T E 76.

P. 83. OF SIMPLE FABLES, THE EPISODIC ARE THE WORST.

Why, of simple fables— $\omega\omega\lambda\omega\nu$ $\mu\nu\theta\omega\nu$? as if the fault here noticed were peculiar to the simple fable; that is, as the term is defined in b Such as Protagoras, Euclid, Ariphrades, mentioned hereafter in this treatife.

the following chapter, the fable that is without revolution or difcovery. But furely this could not be Aristotle's meaning. Something, I am persuaded, is wrong: but I have no probable conjecture to offer; unless it may be thought probable, that AHAN- $T\Omega N$, abbreviated perhaps by the transcriber, might be mistaken for AHA ΩN . What Dacier says in his note is ingenious and true; but by no means, I think, fully accounts for Aristotle's expression, which implies more, than that these unconnected Episodes, "se rencontrent plus ordinairement dans les sables simples."

Victorius states the difficulty fairly, and only asks, with a modesty which inferior critics often want, "An valet quicquam "ad eum (scrupulum) evellendum, quod Tragædia simplex suâ "sponte non valdè elegans est; cui si accesserit hoc vitium, me"ritò deterrima vocari potest?"—For my own part, I must answer in the negative. This idea has been adopted by Goulston, and Le Bossu. They make Aristotle say—"Simple sables are not so good as complex, and simple sables that are Episodic, are the worst of all."—This is to supply a meaning, not to find one.

For the fense of Episodes here, see NOTE 37.

N O T E 77.

P. 83. IN ORDER TO ACCOMMODATE THEIR PIECES TO THE PURPOSES OF RIVAL PERFORMERS, &c.

That actors, as well as Poets, contended for the prize in these Tragic games, or ἀγωνες, might be sufficiently proved by a single passage in the Ethics of Aristotle, where, explaining the difference between ωροωιρεσις, and βελησις, he says, "we may will, or desire, "things not at all in our own power to effect; as, that such a "particular actor may gain the prize:"—ὑωοκριτην τινα νικάν, η αθλητην α. The reader may also see a passage in the Rhetoric, lib. iii.

^a Ethic, Nicom. III. iv. ed. Duval. p. 30.
Αγωνικαι—'ΟΙ ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΑΙ, Hefych.

cap. i. which throws some illustration upon this passage, by shewing the great importance of the players at that time, and the dependance of the Poets upon them: for Aristotle there says of these dramatic contests, that, έκει μειζον δυνανται NYN των ποιητων αι υσοκριται: " the actors; now, have greater power—are more re-" garded, and of more importance to the fuccess of the dramas— "than the Poets." A revolution fomewhat fimilar is recorded by Plutarch to have happened between the later Dithyrambic Poets and their αυληται, or flute-players: - το γαρ παλαιον, έως εις Μελανιπωιδην του των διθυραμβων ωσιητην, συμβεβημα, τες ΑΥΛΗΤΑΣ ωαρα των Ψοιητων λαμβανών τες μισθες, ΠΡΩΤΑΓΩΝΙΣΤΟΥΣΗΣ δηλονοτί ΤΗΣ ΠΟΙΗΣΕΩΣ, των δ' ἀυλητων ΥΠΗΡΕΤΟΥΝΤΩΝ τοις διδασκαλοις. υσερου δε [i. e. when, as he fays, the music of the flute became more complicated, refined, and difficult,] και τετο διεφθαρη b. But all this is nothing, to what we have heard of the modern despotism fometimes exercised by great opera singers over the composers.

The effect which this influence of the players might have, in lengthening and diffuniting the action, according to Aristotle's complaint here, may be easily imagined. Castelvetro observes, with great probability, of these ill-connected execodia,—" Et, peraven- tura, queste digressioni satte per compiacere i rappresentatori, riguardavano più à quello che i rappresentatori sapevano bene con- trasare, che alla materia naturale della savola; accioche essi mostrassero quello che valessero, in quello dove erano più esser- citati, et percio più agevolmente ottenessero la vittoria"." Here, too, the musical reader, will be again reminded of the privilege so b De Musica. ed. H. St. p. 2091.

[°] Poet. d'Arijt. p. 220.—" Suum igitur quisque," says Cicero, noscat ingenium, "acremque se et bonorum et vitiorum suorum judicem præbeat; ne seanici plus quàm nos videantur habere prudentiæ: illi enim, non optimas, sed sibi accommodatissimas fabulas eligunt; qui voce freti sunt, Epigonos, Medumque; qui gestu, Menalippam, Clytæmnestram; semper Rutilius, quem ego memini, Antiopam; non sæpe Æsopus Ajacem. Ergo histrio hoc videbit in sænå, non videbit vir sapiens in vità?"—De Offic. I. 31, intemperately exercised by modern Italian singers—the lineal deficendants, according to some, of the vwongiras of the Greek Opera—that of setting aside, whenever they please, both the Poet, and the composer, by the introduction of such songs, from other operas, as they think most savourable to the display of their peculiar talents.

The influence of modern actors upon the productions of the Poet, is, perhaps, not less than that of the antient; but it seems to be exerted most frequently in a contrary way, though one full as likely to spoil the exercises of the piece—that of lopping. The distress of a Poet on such occasions is represented with true comic force by Mr. Sheridan in his Critic:

UND. PROMPTER.

Sir, the carpenter fays it is impossible you can go to the park scene yet.

Puff.

The park scene! no—I mean the description scene here, in the wood.
UND. PROMPT.

Sir, the performers have cut it out, &c.

End of A& II.

N O T E 78.

P. S3. BEYOND THEIR POWERS----.

I cannot agree with the commentators, who render παρα την ευναμιν, "fupra id quod ferat:—referring δυναμιν to the fable itself. I think it means ultra vires, beyond the powers of the Poets. And so the Abbé Batteux—" audelà de sa portee."

The greater the length of the fable, the greater, evidently, is the difficulty of filling it up with confistent probability; without violating that close connection of incidents, and unity of action, which the rules of Aristotle, and the nature of the drama, require.

N O T E 79.

P. 83. THAT PURPOSE IS BEST ANSWERED BY SUCH EVENTS AS ARE NOT ONLY UNEXPECTED, BUT UNEXPECTED CONSEQUENCES OF EACH OTHER.

Ταυτα δε γινεται μαλιςα τοιαυτα, και μαλλον όταν γενηται παρα την δοξαν δι' ἀλληλα.—This is certainly corrupt; nor does it seem easy to form any probable conjecture, how it stood, as Aristotle left it. Whether the words, και μαλλον, be right or not, they serve, as the text at present stands, only to embarrass a passage, which, if we emit them, seems clear enough, both in construction and meaning. In this I perfectly agree with the last Oxford editor; though I think they should not be hastily ejected from the text.

The connection and drift of the whole passage seems to me to be this. Aristotle is here recommending the close connection of incidents, arising probably or necessarily from each other, in a new point of view—as being of great importance, not only to the unity of fable, but to the principal object of Tragedy, the production of terror and pity. For events are best adapted to this purpose, most striking and affecting, when they happen, not only παρα την δοξαν, but παρα την δοξαν ΔΙ' ΑΛΛΗΛΑ: when the wonder arises, not only from their happening unexpectedly, but from their being the consequences of events from which no one could have expected them to follow. Thus connected, as cause and effect, they will be more surprising, and consequently more affecting, more terrible or piteous*, than if they appear to happen by chance—απο τε αυτοματε και της τυχης:—
είκη—ΜΕΤ' άλληλα only, not ΔΙ' άλληλα, according to the diffinc-

² Mr. Winstanley's edit. p. 287.

^{*} The effect of furprise, when combined with pity or terror, is, to add force to these latter passions, which necessarily predominate in the combination, and to raise the whole feeling to a higher pitch. See Hume's Essay on Tragedy.

tion in the next chapter b. To illustrate this, Aristotle observes, that even events merely fortuitous, are more wonderful and striking, when they are such, as in any degree suggest to the spectator an idea of purpose and design; like the accident he mentions of the statue that sell upon the murderer of the person represented by it.—And all this is connected with what sollows, as well as with what precedes; evidently pointing to his doctrine about the mequationa in the next chapters.

N O T E 80.

P. 84. THE STATUE OF MITYS, &c.

In Plutarch, thus:—και το Μιτιε τε Αργειε, κατα ςασιν αναίζεθεντω, ανδριαντα χαλκεν εν αγορα, θεας έσης, εμωεσείν τω κτειναντι του Μιτιον, και ανελείν. [Περι των βραδεως, &c. p. 980, ed. H. St.]

N O T E 81.

P. 84. FABLES—SIMPLE, AND COMPLICATED.

It is high time to discard the technical jargon of implex sables, used by Addison, and others, after the French writers. If any authority were requisite for speaking English, I have that of Mr. Harris, who renders Aristotle's $\delta\pi\lambda\omega$, and $\pi\epsilon\pi\lambda\epsilon\gamma\omega\epsilon\omega$, by simple, and complicated.—Phil. Inq. p. 146.

[•] Cap. x. Διαφερει πολυ. κ.τ. αλ. 2 Spectator, N° 297.

N O T E 82.

P. 84. WHEN ITS CATASTROPHE IS PRODUCED WITHOUT EITHER REVOLUTION OR DISCOVERY,

Ανευ σερισετικας ή αναγνωρισμε ή μεταβασις γινεται.-Μεταβασις, is the change of fortune which constitutes the catastrophe of the piece. This, which is common to all Tragedy, must not be confounded with the Hequivereia, which, however important, is not effential. Le Bossu, Dacier, and others, by not attending to this distinction, have introduced much confusion into one of the clearest parts of Aristotle's work. Thus, Dacier says-" Il ap-" pelle fable simple, celle ou il n'y a ni changement d'etat, ni re-" connoisance, et dont le denouement n'est qu'un simple passage " de l'agitation et du trouble au repos et à la tranquillité."-He adopts the language of Le Bossu'. Undoubtedly, there are Tragedies without a fudden and unexpected reverse of fortune; but where is the Tragedy, antient or modern, in which there is no "changement d'etat?" This would be no other than a Tragedy without a catastrophe. Thus, these writers take μεταβασις to fignify the mere passage, progress, or suite, of the piece b: whereas it clearly fignifies a change; a transition from prosperous to adverse, or at least from adverse to more adverse, fortune, or the contrary; as Beni has well observed. The sense of the word is clearly fixed by other passages; and in cap. xviii. he expressly makes the μεταβασις, such a change of fortune as is common to every Tragedy. Εςι δε ΠΑΣΗΣ τραγωδιας, το μεν, δεσις, το δε, λυσις.-

² Du Poeme Ep. II. 16.

b "Non si prende μεταβασις in questo luogo per mutatione, come credono alcuni, ma per lo processo dell' attione dal principio al fine." Castelvetro, p. 242.

² Comment. p. 255.

λεγω δε δεσιν μεν είναι την ἀω' ἀρχης μεχρι τυτυ τυ μερυς ὁ ἐσχατον ἐςιν, ἐξ & ΜΕΤΑΒΑΙΝΕΙ ἐις ἐυτυχιαν' λυσιν δε, την ἀωο της ἀρχης ΤΗΣ ΜΕ-ΤΑΒΑΣΕΩΣ μεχρι τελυς.

Mr. Harris, in his Philol. Inquiries, p. 145, &c. feems to have deserted Aristotle for Le Bossu, who, with little reason, in my opinion, passed with him, as well as with Lord Shaftsbury, for " Aristotle's best interpreter"." Throughout his chapter on this fubject, above referred to, he appears to me to confound the μετα-Basis, or change, which Aristotle makes effential to all Tragedy, with that particular kind of change which he denominates wereweταα: for he uses, repeatedly, the word revolution, (his translation of ωεριωετεία,) to express what Aristotle means by μεταβασίς, μεταβαινείν, μεταβαλλείν. He speaks of Othello, and Lear, as complicated fables, and having revolutions. And so, indeed, they have, if we take the word in Aristotle's sense of μεταβασις; I do not see that they have, in his fense of weprwerea. In neither of those Tragedies can it, I think, be faid, that the catastrophe is produced by a sudden change, to the reverse of what is expected, by the spectator, from the circumstances of the attion. At least, with respect to Othello, this feems to admit of no dispute. [See the next NOTE.]

The Abbé Batteux gives, I think very properly, the Polieucte of Corneille, as an example of the fimple fable. "La fable fim-" ple, qui n' a ni revolution fubite, ni reconnoisance; qui commence, continue, s'acheve, fans secousses, ni retours inattendus. Ainsi Poli-" eucle reçoit le baptême, son zele lui fait renverser les autels des payens, il est arrêté, jugé, mis à mort: c'est une fable simple."

Victorius, Beni, Piccolomini, and Goulston, agree with me in my idea of this passage, where the words, συνέχες και μιας, are not put to characterize the simple sable, as Victorius well observes, but refer merely to that unity and continuity of action, which had been established as necessary to Tragedy in general.

d Treatise On Music, Painting, &c. p. 83, Note.

[·] Principes de la Lit. tome iii. p. 84.

N O T E 83.

P. 84. A REVOLUTION IS----A CHANGE INTO THE RE-VERSE OF WHAT IS EXPECTED FROM THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE ACTION.

Εςι δε ωεριωετεια μεν, ή εις το έναντιον των ωραττομενων μεταβολη. καθαωερ ειρηται.

The fense of these words has not, I think, been exactly given in any translation I have yet feen, except that of the accurate and judicious Piccolomini: "La Peripetia intendo io essere una muta-"tion di fortuna, che (fatta nel modo che si é detto,) accaschi al " contrario di quello che dalle cose ordite aspettar si potesse." In literal English—" When the things that are doing (τα ωραττομενα) "have an effect the very reverse of what is expected from them." That this is the meaning, appears plainly from the instance immediately subjoined: ώσωερ έν τω Οιδιωτοδι, έλθων ΩΣ ΕΥΦΡΑΝΩΝ του Οιδιωθν, και ασαλλαξων τε ωρος την μητερα φοβε, δηλωσας όςις ην Τ'ΟΥ-NANTION ΕΠΟΙΗΣΕ. As the words—ή εις το εναντιον των ωρατ. μετ. are rendered by Dacier, and others - changement de fortune "en une fortune contraire"—they express nothing but what is common to Tragedy in general; and weprwerea is confounded with μεταβασις. [See last NOTF.] But, it is well observed by Piccolomini, "Non s' hà, parimente, da intendere, quando diciamo la " peripetia effer mutation di fortuna, ogni sorte di mutatione da una " conditione et stato di fortuna ad un' altro; non potendo esser Tra-" gedia alcuna in cui qualche così fatta mutatione non fi ritrovi." [p. 167.] In the usual way of translating the passage, a circumstance essential to the weprwerea is entirely omitted in the definition; its being furprifing, and contrary to expectation. This, it is true,

² Περιπετειαι δε λεγονται τα ΠΑΡ' ΕΛΠΙΔΑ συμβεβινιστα παντα, και έυτως παρα ΤΡΑΓΙ-ΚΟΙΣ έτι καλευται.—Schol. Nicand. quoted by Robortelli, p. 106, Dacier has expressed in his version, by the words, "contre ce qu'on "avoit attendu." But this is, professedly, his own supplement of Aristotle's text. And indeed I once thought the text desective, and that Aristotle had probably written it—μεταβολη, ΠΑΡΑ ΤΗΝ ΔΟΞΑΝ, καθαπερ ειρηται: alluding to the latter part of cap. ix. But, as I now understand the passage, this idea is sufficiently implied. The words, καθαπερ ειρηται, have puzzled and divided the commentators, by their obscurity of reference. Upon the whole I am inclined to think, they point to what he had said cap. ix. [Transl. Part II. Sect. 7.] which, as I before observed, [NOTE 80,] seems manifestly to be a preparation for this chapter; and in which the words, παρα την δοξαν δι άλληλα—events that are "unexpected consequences of each other"—answer to the definition of περιπεταα, as here explained.

That this is the meaning of Aristotle's words, I have no doubt. But, perhaps, even the words themselves have been inaccurately rendered, and πραττομενων should be constructed, not with μεταβολη, but with εναντιον:—εις το εναντιον των πραττομενων: i. e. in contrarium eorum quæ aguntur. This was suggested to me by the literal version which the accurate Mr. Harris has given of the words in his Philol. Inq. p. 148.—" A REVOLUTION is, as has been already "said, a change into the reverse of what is doing." The definition, I think, though its sense be the same in either way, would thus be more clear, and would answer more exactly to what follows.

N O T E 84.

P. 84. Thus in the Oedipus, the messenger, &c.

- Ελθων ως ευφοανων τον Οιδιπεν, και απαλλαξων τε προς την μητερα φοβε. Alluding, probably, to the very words of the messenger in Sophocles:

Τι δητ' έγωγ' ε ΤΟΥΔΕ ΤΟΥ ΦΟΒΟΥ σ', ἀναξ, Εωειωερ ΕΥΝΟΥΣ ΗΛΘΟΝ, ΕΞΕΛΥΣΑΜΗΝ;

v. 1012.

N O T E 85.

P. 86. These then are two parts of the fable—revolution and discovery.

Δυο μεν εν τε μυθε μερη ΠΕΡΙ ΤΑΥΤΑ ές, περιπετεια και αναγνωριτις. " Circa bæc." About what? What are we to understand by ταυτα? -- Victorius says, τα πραττομένα; and Dacier, after him, "Qui regardent le sujet." I cannot be satisfied with this. wραττομενα, the fubject, the action, are fufficiently expressed by the word mules. Would Aristotle have said, "These are two parts of "the fable relative to the fable?" I have, therefore, neglected the word ween in my translation, in conformity to the probable conjecture of Madius. Every reader fees how eafily it might get into the text from the word wegiverea which presently follows. I rather think, however, that, retaining week, we should read, week T' ATTA:--" circa easdem res;"-to point out the close connection of these two parts of the fable, as things of the same kind, and counterparts, as it were, to each other, co-operating to the fame effect—the production of terror, pity, surprise, &c. And thus they are afterwards mentioned together, as constituting one species of Tragedy: ή μεν γαρ, σεσιλεγμενη, ής το όλον εςι ΠΕΡΙΠΕΤΕΙΑ KAI ANAΓΝΩΡΙΣΙΣ. [cap. xviii. Transl. Part II. Sect. 19.] The fame mode of expression occurs in the Ethics ad Nicom. lib. iv. cap. 13. ΠΕΡΙ ΤΑ ΑΥΤΑ δε σχεδον ΕΣΤΙ και ή αλαζονεια; μεσοτης: " in iifdem vertitur." That is, as appears from the context, the virtue, of which he is there speaking, was of the same kind, or class, with that, which was the subject of the foregoing chapter. Both were among the αρεται διειλητικαι. So, in the conclusion of the fublequent fublequent chapter—τρεις εν αι ειξημέναι εν τω βιω μεσοτητες ΕΙΣΙ δε σασαι ΠΕΡΙ λογων τινων και σραζεων κοινωνιαν.

N O T E 86.

P. 86. Disasters, comprehend all painful or destructive actions, &c.

It seems hardly reconcilable with philosophical accuracy, to use such an expression as $\Pi A\Theta O\Sigma$ is $\Pi PA\Xi I\Sigma$ —defining the suffering to be the action that causes the suffering.

In his Metaphyfics he puts it thus:—τα μεγεθη των συμφορων και λυπηρων ΠΑΘΗ λεγεται ...

This word, $\varpi \alpha \theta \otimes s$, in the fense here used, is very embarrassing to a translator. The word passion, in this sense, of suffering, is, with us, appropriated to a subject, from which it cannot, without a fort of profanation, be transferred to any other. The French, however, have done this without scruple, though the word, when so applied, must be explained before it can be understood. Upon the whole, I could find no single words that seemed to me to answer so nearly to $\varpi \alpha \theta \otimes s$, and its adjective, $\varpi \alpha \theta \eta \tau \tau \tau \alpha \eta \tau$, in the sense in which they are used here, and in cap. xviii. as disaster, and its correspondent adjective, disastrous. Their original, desastre, is explained in the Dict. of the French Academy, by "accident function."

- " Wherein I spoke of most disastrous chances,
- " Of moving accidents [παθη] by flood, and field."
 Othello, Att I. Sc. III.

N O T E 87.

P. 86. THE EXHIBITION OF DEATH, &c.

Εν τω φανερω θανατοι.—A plain passage, which the commentators seem to have taken great pains to perplex with difficulties of their own invention. The plain meaning of the expression is, exhibited on the stage: ἐν ὀφθαλμοις φαινομένε ΤΟΥ ΠΑΘΟΥΣ, as it is expressed in the Rhetoric, lib. ii. cap. viii. p. 560.

Aristotle is here only explaining the term $\pi\alpha\theta$; not laying down a rule, nor deciding concerning the propriety, or impropriety, of such exhibitions. Nothing is more evidently absurd, than the attempts of Dacier and other French critics to transfer the delicacy of their theatre to that of the antients. The scrupulous delicacy of French Tragedy was, I believe, as unknown to the Athenian stage, as its rigid and strutting dignity. A single passage, and that, from the most polished of the three Greek Tragic Poets whose works are extant, may sufficiently prove this; I mean the description of Oedipus tearing out his own eyes, in Sophocles.

Τοιαυτ' έφυμνων, πολλακις τε κ'ουχ' άπαξ Ηρασσ', έπαιρων βλεφαρα φοινιαι δ' όμε Γληναι γενει έτεγγον εδ' άνιεσαν Φονε μυδωσας ςαγονας άλλ' όμε μελας Ομβρ© χαλαζης άιματος έτεγγετο **.

Oed. Tyr. v. 1284.

- "Thus oft exclaiming, he his eyelids raifed,
- 45 And rent the orbs of fight; the bleeding balls
- "Imbath'd his cheeks, nor ceased the gushing drops,
- ⁴⁴ But rain'd a shower of black and streaming gore."

 Potter's Translation.
- * This line is, undoubtedly, faulty. The best emendation I have seen proposed appears to me to be that of Mr. Heath, who would read, aimatoris—i. e. contracted, aimatoris.

Pp

But Sophocles did not confine himself to description. Oedipus himself immediately appears upon the stage, and exhibits the shocking spectacle of his bloody eyes to the audience. Certainly, the French rule, "de ne pas ensanglanter le Theatre," was not much more strictly observed here by Sophocles, than it was by Shakspeare in his Lear, where Gloster's eyes are trodden out, in particular, upon the stage.

I cannot quit this instance from Sophocles, without diverting the reader, (for I am persuaded it will divert him,) with Pere Brumoy's apology, or, rather, with the joint apology of him, M. Dacier, and Boileau. "Le grand Cornellle et ses successeurs "Tragiques, ont crû que ce seroit une chose horrible d'exposer "Oedipe aveugle et sanglant aux yeux des spectateurs. M. Dacier "leur repond trés-bien par ces vers de Despreaux, Art Poet. "chant ii.

- "Il n'est point de serpent, ni de monstre odieux,
- " Qui par l'art imité ne puisse plaire aux yeux.
- "D'un pinceau delicat l'artifice agréable
- "Du plus affreux objet fait un objet AIMABLE!
- " Ainsi pour nous CHARMER, la Tragédie en pleurs
- "D'Oedipe tout fanglant fit parler les douleurs 2."

This is pushing Aristotle's principle, of the pleasure we receive from the imitation even of disagreeable objects, rather farther than, I believe, he thought of. A critic of much more taste and much less prejudice, speaking of the Philochetes of Sophocles, has observed, "that the antients thought bodily pains and wounds, &cc. (περιωδυνιαι και τρωσεις) proper objects to be repre-

Μελαινα τ' άκρε τις παρερρωγεν ποδο'Αιμορραγης φλεψ.---

² Theatre des Grecs, i. 345.

b Above, cap. iv. Transl. Part I. Sect. 5.

See v. 749, &c. particularly, 796,7: and the description of the bleeding wound, v. 845.

"fented on the stage. See also the Trackiniæ of Sophocles, and the lamentations of Hercules in it "."

Hippolytus, after having been dragged over the rocks, and almost torn to pieces, by his fiery coursers, appears upon the stage with his mangled and bleeding limbs.—But, according to Boileau, Dacier, &c. these are all "objets aimables."

NOTE 88.

P. 86. THE COMMOI ARE FOUND IN SOME ONLY.

The Greek fays—idia de, τα απο σκηνης ΚΑΙ κομμοι. Here, the κομμω, and the τα άπο σκηνης, are represented as diffinct things. But in the definition afterwards, Kompa appears to be the name given to the joint lamentation of the chorus and the actors. μο δε, θρηνο κοινο χορε και άπο σκηνης. Victorius states this difficulty, but without giving any fatisfactory folution. I see no way of reconciling these passages, unless we suppose Aristotle to have expressed himself very loosely and inaccurately, and to have meant, that unpup was the name appropriated to that part of the Xopixov which joined or alternated with one or more of the αωο σκηνης—i. e. the actors; fo that by, Κομμω δε, θρηνω κοινω χορε και άπο σκηνης, we are to understand only, that Κομμω was that Oppus or lamentation of the chorus, in which the actors, alternately, took part; as if the Greek had been thus: - θρην ω χορε 'ΟΥ ΚΟΙ-ΝΩΝΟΥΣΙΝ δι απο σκηνης. And fo, τα απο σκηνης ΚΑΙ κομμοι would only mean, the nomuon of the chorus with the ano sunying—that is, mixed with the lamentation of the actors, or persons of the drama.

d Dr. Warton's Essay on Pope, vol. i. 73, Note.

[•] Hippel. Eurip. v. 1236, &c.—and 1348. In Mr. Potter's translation, v. 1318, 19, 20; and 1438, &c.

But it feems more for the credit of our philosophical critic, to give up the first of these passages as corrupt, and to adhere to the plain sense of the definition. I have, therefore, taken no notice of the words, to down our only in my version. Nothing is lost by the suppression. The sense of the word nour is lest, like that of the other terms, to be fixed by its definition.

N O T E 89.

P. S6. Between entire choral odes.

I confess myself not satisfied as to the meaning of this expresfion, ΌΛΩΝ χορικων μελων. I have therefore adhered to the fair and literal translation of the words.—But what is an entire choral ode or fong? Is it that, which is in the regular lyric form, in strophe and antistrophe? So it seems most natural to understand it. But a difficulty meets us. For when the nagodo, as it often, and indeed almost always, happens, is not such a regular Antistrophic Ode, what name is to be given to that part of the Tragedy, which lies between the wapods and the first Antiftrophic Ode? It cannot make a part of the Heodog , for that ends with the Hands. The Exode is out of the question. There remains only the Epifode; and to that it cannot belong, confiftently with Aristotle's definition of Ewecoobiov, because it will not be, according to this fense of δλων, " between entire choral Odes." If we take entire to mean, all choral, i. e. not broken and interrupted by the are outputs, or the persons of the drama, we shall still be embarraffed with the fame difficulty: for, whenever the wagoods. is not, in this fense, entire, which is frequently the case a, the part between that and the first entire Ode, will be without a name.

⁴ As in the Παρεδο of the Orestes of Euripides, the Eketra of Sophocles, &c.

Shall we, then, with some commentators, suppose Aristotle by δλων χορικών μελών, to have meant only, δλε χορε μελών—i. e. melodies sung by the whole chorus ? This removes the difficulty. Yet I can hardly conceive, that he would have expressed himself in a manner so wantonly ambiguous, when the clear and decisive expression—δλε χορε, which he presently after uses, was so obvious.

From an accurate and philosophical writer, one would naturally expect a chapter of definitions to be clear. But whoever expects it here will certainly be disappointed. Almost every definition, to be perfectly intelligible, wants other definitions, which are not given, and which the obscure and imperfect information to be found in other antient authors will not enable us to supply.

N O T E 90.

P. 86. THE PARODE IS THE FIRST SPEECH OF THE WHOLE CHORUS.

Παροδω μεν ή πρωτη ΛΕΞΙΣ όλε χορε.—Though λεξις, in its proper fignification, is mere fpeech, yet it appears to have been occasionally extended to such melody as imitated speech, and to have answered nearly to the modern term, recitative. [See NOTE 46, and particularly the passage from Plutarch at the end of it.] And such, I have no doubt, is the sense in which it is here used, to distinguish the melody of the Parodos from that of the regular choral odes; which I suppose to have been a more varied, measured, and, as we may, not improperly, term it, a more musical melody. For want of understanding this distinction, the commentators have made strange consustion, by taking λεξις, either in its literal sense of mere speaking, or in a sense absolutely synonymous with $\mu\epsilon\lambda$, as Dacier does. But it is hardly to be imagined, that Aristotle would use the word $\lambda\epsilon\xi\iota_5$ without any reason; and, that the $\Pi\alpha\rho\delta$ could not be mere speech, or declamation, such as that of our stage, seems evident enough from the expression, $\lambda\epsilon\xi\iota_5$ OAOY $\chi\rho\rho$. A number may sing together, in a kind of measured recitative, or simple chanting; but they cannot well speak together, without intolerable consustion. This would be that very $\chi\rho\rho$ dialentine, which Demetrius mentions as a thing absurd and unheard of a.

b So Goulflon—" Inter plenos choricos cantus; qui scil. ab univers fiebant choro." Vict. "Plini integrique cantus." So Piccol. "Intieri canti." Heinfius, Dacier, and Batteux, avoid the difficulty by omitting the word δλων in their translations.

There is a fingular passage in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, which affords, I think, a strong confirmation, both of the sense which I have here given to the word $\lambda \epsilon \xi_{15}$, and of the propriety of its application in that sense to the choral $\Pi \alpha \rho \epsilon \delta \delta$. In the 11th section of his treatise De Struct. Orat. in order to shew, how little prosody was regarded by the composers of the Tragic melodies, he criticises the melody of the following lines from the Oresles of Euripides:

Σιγα, σιγα, λευκον ἰχνος ἀρβυλης Τιθειτε, μη πτυπατε— Αποπροβατ' εκασ', ἀποπροθι κοιτας. υ. 140.

Now it is remarkable, 1. that he calls this, MEAOS, and yet reprefents it as faid by Electra: Eugentides MEAON, à πεποιημε την Ηλεπτραν ΛΕΓΟΥΣΑΝ— π 005 τον χοςον.—2. That the melody, to which these words were set, was the simplest possible; a kind of

* Demet. περί Ερμ. Sest. 168, where speaking of some poems of Sappho, that descended beneath the Lyric dignity and elegance, both in subject and style, he says, they were fitter to be recited, than sung, and were ill adapted to be performed by a chorus, or accompanied by the lyre; unless," says he, "there were such a thing as a speaking chorus:"—ἐι μη τις ἐιη χος Ταλεκτιά.

Choral recitative, indeed, judiciously introduced, and not continued too long, I have often thought, might occasionally be so managed as to produce a striking effect. An example of it, and a very fine one, is to be sound in an Oratorio of that admirable composer, Eman. Bach, of which the title, in English, is, The Israelites in the Wilderness.

chanting recitative. The three first words, for instance, were set to one note b.

—and in other words too, the same tone, as this author clearly informs us, was frequently repeated. This may be regarded as somewhat of a musical curiosity. For it is an authoric, though indeed a very scanty and imperfect specimen, of one part of the dramatic choral music of the Greeks. 3dly, This very melody was probably that of the Παρεδω of this Tragedy. Dionysius, indeed, gives these words to Electra^c; but in all the editions of Euripides which I have seen, the two first lines are given to the chorus; with more propriety, I think, if we attend to what goes before. Electra had just said to the chorus, on their coming in while Orestes was sleeping;

The words, therefore, which Dionysius, quoting probably by memory, attributes to Electra, would seem to come more naturally from the mouths of the choral virgins, repeating to each other the caution she had given them. But whether this be so or not, yet, that this was the first entry of the choral upon the stage, is clear from the preceding speech of Electra: and the Lyric part, which follows that speech, if it does not begin with, probably contains, at least, the mounty dekn due not begin with, probably contains, at least, the mounty dekn due not begin all in the regular choral form of Strophe and Antistrophe, and, in all probability, set throughout to melody of the same kind. Perhaps the whole choras might not begin to sing, till the third Strophe, Motiva, motiva vic.—If,

 $^{^{\}mathbf{b}}$ Εν γας δη τετοις, το, Σιγα, σιγα, λέυκον, έφ' ΈΝΟΣ ΦΘΟΓΓΟΥ ΜΕΛΩΔΕΙΤΑΙ.

So does the author of one of the arguments prefixed to the Tragedy: ώς φησιν Ελεκτρα τω χορω.

as Victorius contends, this be not the Parodos, it cannot begin before, v. 316.

But, the very application of the word $\pi\alpha\rho\rho\delta$, which properly fignifies the entry, or arrival of the chorus, to the $\pi\rho\alpha\eta$ refer, or first speech of the whole chorus, shews, I think, sufficiently, the close connection of the two things; and that we are never to look for that first speech, at such a distance from the sirst entrance, of the chorus.

But, it may, perhaps, be objected to the distinction I understand here between $\lambda \in \mathcal{E}_{i,j}$ and $\mu \in \lambda \otimes_{i,j}$, that it will expose us to the very difficulty mentioned in the last Note: it will make Aristotle's enumeration of the parts into which Tragedy is divided, incomplete; because, if we admit it, the part between the Hageod's and the first Στασιμών or regular Ode, will want a name. For, if any thing, it must be Emerodien; but this, it may be said, it cannot be, because it will not be, according to Aristotle's definition, μεταξυ χορικων MEAΩN; the Parode being not μελ., but λεξις.—It feems a fufficient answer to this objection, to observe, that λεξις, here, is not opposed to μελω in general, but only to a particular species of μελω. Strictly speaking, the simplest chant, or even such recitative, as approaches the nearest to common speech, is yet as much $\mu \in \lambda \otimes_{\bullet}$, melody, music, as the most refined Opera songe. It is called $\lambda \in \xi_{15}$, only comparatively. Nay, the word μελ is sometimes, in a wider fense, applied even to speech itself. And so, above, we have learning e See Dist. II. p. 52, note *, and the passage of Aristoxenus, concerning the effential distinction between all speech, and all singing; i. e. that in the one, the voice moves b_j slides, in the other, by intervals, or skips.

 $^{^{1}}$ — \dot{n} μεν ΕΙΣΟΔΟΣ τε χορε, ΠΑΡΟΔΟΣ. Jul. Poll.—And fo the feholiast on Hephastion: ἐτω καλειται \dot{n} πεωτη των χορων ἐπι την σκηνην ἐισοδΦ. Ed. de Pauro. p. 74.

⁶ Differt. II. p. 51. note 4: and Dion. Hal. Sect. XI.

'APMONIA'. Aristotle, therefore, in the expression χ_{00} : MEAON, may be supposed, without any inconsistence, to include, what, asterwards, in the particular definition of $\pi \alpha_{00}$ where distinction was necessary, he denominates λ_{00} :

It must be owned, that Aristotle's parsimonious brevity has left fome confusion in this subject; but, in the illustrations of his commentators, it is "confusion worse consounded." And this has arisen from their applying to the Greek drama, without the slightest foundation, the Roman division into five acts. It is now, I believe, pretty well understood, that such an idea is totally inapplicable to the Greek Tragedyh. If we must talk of acts, it would be more proper to fay they had three; forming our division upon the three parts, which, according to Aristotle, were essential to every drama, the Modor , the Emerodian, and the Egod ; not upon the number of choral odes, which is different in different dramas. Trachinia, for example, there are not fewer than /ix choral odes. If these are to determine the number of acts, as Dacier contends, this Tragedy will confift of feven. Brumoy, to divide this piece into five acts, is reduced to admit an entire ode in the middle of his first act; so that the Episode, which Aristotle defines to be that part which is μεταξυ όλων χορικων μελων, begins in the Προλογώ, and before the Mapodo, which, according to Brumoy, must be the second ode. Another ode he is obliged to admit in the middle of his last act: contrary to Aristotle's definition of Egodo. - Dacier makes the prologue of the Oedipus Coloneus confist of 700 verses. Nothing can be more improbable, or more inconsistent with Aristotle's idea of its purpose. [See NOTE 40.] But he was forced into this abfurdity, ⁸ Cap. 4.

[&]quot;This was proved long ago in a differtation by the Abbé Vatry, in the 11th vol. of the Mem. de l'Acad. Roy, &c.—See also the presace to Franklin's Sophocles.—Yet Lord Kaims says, positively, of the Greek Tragedies—"there are five acts in each."—El. of Crit. ii. 414.

³ Note on Aristot. p. 177.

The expression, $\Pi P\Omega TH$ $\lambda \epsilon \xi_{i} \xi_{i}$ $\delta \lambda s$ $\chi_{0} \rho s$, seems to imply, that other choral parts, beside the Parode, were also $\lambda \epsilon \xi_{i} \xi_{i}$; i. e. were sung by the whole chorus in the same fort of chanting and simple melody. But who will undertake to distinguish these parts, and to tell us, exactly, what was Air, and what Recitative? what was sung by the whole choir, and what was, à voce fola!?—I will not bewilder my reader and myself in a labyrinth without a clue.

The scholiast upon the Phanissa (v. 212.) says, that the Παροδω was sung by the chorus, "as they entered upon the stage."—Παροδω δε, ε΄ς τιν αδη χορε βαδιζοντω, αδομενη άμα τη ε΄ισοδω, ως το—Σιγα, σιγα, &c. And, indeed, in the example he here gives from the Orestes, the entrance of the choral troop is clearly marked by what precedes. Electra says—— ^{*} Remarques fur l'Oedipe, at the end of his translation of that Tragedy.

The learned reader knows that this cannot be determined by their speaking of themselves in the fingular number, for this they do almost constantly, in all the Odes. So, Ειπες ΕΓΩ μαντις είμι, just referred to, &c.—Neither can we say, what at first view, indeed, seems probable, that whatever appears in the regular Lyric form of Strophe and Antistrophe, was air, as opposed to recitative, or mere chant: for in some Tragedies the Παροδω itself is in this regular Lyric form; as, in the Trachiniae and Electra of Sophocles; Iphig, in Aul. of Euripides, &c.

'Αιδ' αυ ΠΑΡΕΙΣΙ τοις εμοις θρητημασι Φιλαι συνωδοι.——

7.132.

And this is frequently the case. Thus, in the Phanissia, that the Tugior διδμα λιπεσ – v. 212, (not, Καδμω ἐμολε – v. 651, as Dacier makes it,) is the true Parode, as, indeed, it is expressly called by the author of the Greek argument prefixed to the Perse of Æschylus, is confirmed by this passage, announcing the entry of the choral virgins, in the preceding lambics, where the old attendant desires Antigone to retire:——

'Οχλ© γαρ, ώς ταραγμ© εισηλθευ πολιυ, ΧΩΡΕΙ [is coming] γυναικων προς δομες τυραννικες.

v. 206.

Thus too, in the Oedipus Coloneus, the first appearance of the chorus is thus announced by Antigone:

Σιγα· ΠΟΡΕΥΟΝΤΑΙ γαρ 'ΩΔΕ δη τινες Χρονώ παλαιοι——

U. III.

And the Magool immediately follows, v. 117.

In the Iphigenia in Tauris, the arrival of the choral women is marked by themselves:

See also, v. 65. $Ou\pi\omega = -\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon u\sigma u$.

The Parode is not less distinctly marked in the Medea, v. 131. Xo. Εκλυον φωναν—κ. τ. άλ.—in the Heraclidæ, where the chorus is called in by Iolaus, v. 69:—in the Helena, v. 179:—in the Hercules, v. 107, &c.

When the attendant spirit, in Comus, "opens the business of "the drama to a solitary forest, without an audience," he does no more than Venus^m, and the ghost of Polydorusⁿ, and Iphigenia^o, and many others, in the Tragedies of Euripides, had done before him. The learned and ingenious editor of Milton's Occasional Poems says, that, "in a Greek Tragedy, this objection would

In the Hippolytus.

Note that the Hippolytus.

Note the Hippolytus.

Note that the Hippolytus.

Note t

"have been obviated by the chorus, which was always present;" but I am afraid the want of "recollection" must be transferred from Milton to himself. There are not, I think, more than three or four Greek Tragedies, in which the chorus is present from the beginning.

This $\Pi agod \otimes$, or entry of the chorus, probably made one of the most splendid and popular parts of the OYIE, or shew, of the antient Tragedy. It is mentioned by Aristotle, in his Nicomachean Ethics, as a custom of the Megarians, who were a luxurious and oftentatious people, to be at the expence of furnishing purple dresses for the $\Pi agod \otimes$ even of their comic stage. It appears, however, from a curious fragment of Menander, to have been a practice, not uncommon with the Greek Managers, to place mutes among their choral singers, in order to complete the visible number requisite:

Ου παντες ἀδεσ', ἀλλ' ἀφωνοι δυο τινες 'Η τρεις παρεςηκασι, ΠΑΝΤΩΝ ΕΣΧΑΤΟΙ, 'Εις τον ἀριθμον'—και τεθ' ὁμοιως πως έχει' Χωραν κατεχομεν, ζωσι δ' ὁις ἐςιν βιω'.

As in a chorus

All do not fing, but, in the hindmost ranks,

Some two or three stand mute to make a number,

So is it here;—we ferve to fill a place;

They only live, who have the means of living.

Mr. Warton's edit. of Milton's Occ. Poems, p. 129. "Milton did not recollect, that the Spirit was opening the business of the drama to a solitary forest, without an audience."

⁹ See Dacier, p. 170, note 5.

^{*} και πωμωδοις χος ηγων, εν τη ΠΑΡΟ $\Delta\Omega$ ι πος φυς αν εισφερων, ώσπερ οι Μεγαρεις. IV. 2. ed. Ox.Wilk.

[.] Menand. and Philem. Reliq. ed. Clerici, p. 221.

NOTE 91.

P. 86. THE STASIMON INCLUDES ALL THOSE CHORAL ODES THAT ARE WITHOUT ANAPÆSTS AND TROCHEES.

Στασιμον δε, μελ Σορε το άνευ άναπαις ε και τροχαιε.—If we are to understand this strictly, as expressing the exclusion of those feet from the regular odes, I cannot perceive it to be true. Dacier, therefore, understands only, that those feet were very rarely used in those Odes, compared with the Happelo, which he calls "pre-"mier chant du chœur;" in which, he fays, and very truly, that they prevail.—" Ces deux pieds---regnent," &c. p. 179.—It is possible that Aristotle might mean this; but it is not what he fays. He fays, " that μελ .— that lyric part, of the chorus, which is "without anapæsts and trochees." I rather think, he means only those Odes, the regular flanzas of which are not broken and interrupted by an intermixture of anapæstic or trochaic verses κατα συςημα, (according to the metrical language,) like the Parodos, as I take it to be, of the Antigone,—Ακτις ἀελικ—ν. 100—that of the PhiloEletes—Ti xen—v. 136, and of the Prometheus of Æschylus. And this, I believe, will, in general, be found true of the regular Odes subsequent to the Παροδ. For, in the Παροδ. itself, the general prevalence of the anapæstic measure must be evident to every one who turns over the Greek Tragedians.

N O T E 92.

P. 86. THE COMMOS, &c.

Κομμώς "Ήγειτο γυναικων μυρια πληθυς, μετα ΚΟΜΜΟΥ ΚΑΙ "ΟΛΟΛΥΓΗΣ" — τετεςι, γοε και όδυρμε. — Suidas.

The phrase, ἀπο σκηνης, is commonly used by Aristotle to denote the actors, as distinguished from the chorus; because, as Jul. Pollux tells us, ΣΚΗΝΗ μεν ΥΠΟΚΡΙΤΩΝ ίδιον, ή δε ἐρχηςρα τε χορε ε. Thus, Prob. xlix. of Sect. 19, speaking of the Dorian and Hypophrygian modes, he says, they were both, χορω μεν ἀναρμοςα, τοις δε ἀπο σκηνης ἐικειστερα.—So, Prob. xxx. and Prob. xv. τα ἀπο σκηνης, (the dialogue,) is opposed to τα τε χορε—the chorus. I was much surprised, therefore, to find the meaning of this phrase so widely mistaken, in the late Camb. edit. where ἀπο σκηνης is thus explained: if id est, ἀτεχνω—ad choragi munus, non Poetæ, pertinens."

An example of the Kompo, pointed out by Victorius, may be found in the Andromache of Euripides, v. 1197.

I know not why some of the commentators confine these joint lamentations of chorus and actors to the Exode, or what they call the last ast. They are often, I think, to be found in other parts of the drama; "dans le cours des actes," as Dacier rightly obferves. We have an example of this between Tecmessa and the chorus, in the Ajax, v. 901. Iw, por por---. Another occurs very early in the Iphigenia in Tauris, v. 143, &c. where Iphigenia, affifted by the choral virgins, her attendants, performs the funereal libation to the manes of her brother, whom she supposes to be dead, and fings a funereal dirge. The chorus, indeed, have fo finall a part in this lamentation, that it may be thought hardly to answer Aristotle's definition of bento zono &c. But this, in fact, seems no objection, because the lamentation of Iphigenia is broken off abruptly, as Mr. Markland has well observed, at v. 235, by the arrival of the shepherd. I consider it, therefore, only as an unfinished Kommes. But, that it answers to that idea, appears, I think, from the whole cast of it; from the frequent occurrence of the interjections, φευ, φευ-έ, έ-άι, άι-όι μοι, &c.-and of the very word, θεην , throughout, and, from the answer of the chorus:

* IV. 19. * Ed. Cantab. 1785, p. 125.

Ω διμωαι, δυσθρηνητοις
 Ως θρηνοις έγκειμαι.

Χορ.-ΑΝΤΙΨΑΛΜΟΥΣ ώδας

Υμνον τ' Ασιηταν σοι Βαεβαρον ἰαχαν

Δεσποινα γ' έξαυδασω, Γαν έν ΘΡΗΝΟΙΣΙ μεσαν Νεκυσι μελεον⁴.

v. 178.

To thee thy faithful train
The Afiatic hymn will raife,
A doleful, a barbaric strain,
Responsive to thy lays,
And steep in tears the mournful song,
Notes which to the dead belong;
Distinal notes attun'd to woe
By Pluto in the realms below.——

Potter's Eurip. v. 206.

N O T E 93.

P. 87. This raises disgust, rather than terror or compassion.

Literally,—" for this is neither terrible, nor piteous, but shock"ing." ε γαρ φοβερον, εδε ελεείνου τετο, άλλα μιαρον εςίν.—But we certainly must not understand Aristotle to affert, that no pity is d "Mortuis miseram." "Quid hoc sit, nescio," says Mr. Markland. But, perhaps, it should be rendered, "Mortuis vanam, inutilem," in the Homeric sense of μελε. See Il. Ψ. 795—μελε. Διν. —useles, unavailing praise. So, in Virgil—"inani munere." Æn. vi. 886.—And, Æn. xi. 51.

Μελε Φ-ΜΑΤΑΙΟΣ. Suid. and Hesych. So, Apoll. Rhod. i. 1249. ΜΕΛΕΗ δε δι επλετο φωνη. "Vanus ei erat clamor."

Miaρον-shocking, difgusting, &c. because contrary to our established ideas of justice, and to every moral sentiment of our nature. History, indeed; must represent facts as they are; without any regard to the fentiments they may excite. But the case is far otherwise with the fictions of the Poet. We think he ought not to make such a representation of things b. We consider it as discouraging to virtue, as immoral,—even, in some degree, as irreligious. What reader of CLARISSA does not find the pity, the pleasurable pity, at least, which it is the object of such a work to excite, frequently counteracted, and diminished, to say no more, by fome indignant feelings of this kind? The story of Sidney Biddulph, though a work of confiderable merit in the execution, is liable to the same objection. The mind of a reader is harrassed and revolted throughout by the most improbable and determined perverseness of unfortunate combinations; and shocked, at last, by the wanton production of mifery, neither deferved, nor likely .- Ou φοβερον, εδε έλεωνον τετο, άλλα μιαρον. Fontenelle says, in perfect conformity with Aristotle, "Plus le heros est aimé; plus il est

² And see Rhet. II. 8.

^{6 &}quot;Cum historia vera successus rerum minime pro meritis virtutum et scelerum marret; corrigit eam Poesis, et exitus et sortunas, secundum merita, et ex lege "Nemescos, exhibet."

-Bacon, De Aug. Sc. lib. ii. c. 13.

[&]quot; convenable

"convenable de le rendre heureux à la fin. Il ne faut point ren"voyer le spectateur avec la douleur de plaindre la destinée d'un
"homme verteux." Reslex. sur la Poet. Sect. 52.

To do justice to the author's meaning, two other things should be kept in mind: 1. That, by his επιείνης, he here means a character of consummate virtue, whose missfortunes were not drawn upon him by any fault of his own. This is evident from what follows. The sense of the word is sufficiently fixed by its opposite, ΣΦΟΔΡΑ πονηφον, as well as by the equivalent expression, αρετη ΔΙΑΦΕΡΩΝ και δικαιοσυνη, in his description of the proper character for Tragedy. 2. That he presently afterwards softens a little the rigour of his precept as here delivered, by saying, that the character should be either such as he had prescribed, "or better "rather than avorse:" βελτιον μαλλον η χειρον.

N O T E 94.

P. 87. FOR IT IS NEITHER GRATIFYING IN A. MORAL VIEW, &c.

Oute γαρ ΦΙΛΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΝ —. Without entering into a long discussion of all that has been urged by the commentators in favour of the different senses they have assigned to the word φιλανθρωπον here, I shall only say, that, upon the most attentive comparison of this passage with another, in cap. xviii. where the term again occurs, it appears to me, that the full meaning of it is, gratifying to philanthropy; pleasing by its conformity to our natural sense of justice, by its moral tendency. Indeed this seems to follow from the word μιαρον, to which φιλανθρωπον is opposed. The representation of a good man (ἐπιεκης) made miserable is μιαρον—disgusting, shocking. Why? Plainly, on account of its evident injustice, and immoral tendency. The representation of a very bad man $(\sigma \varphi \circ \delta \varphi \alpha \pi \circ v \circ \varphi)$ punished by calamity, is $\varphi \circ \lambda \alpha v \theta \varphi \omega \pi \circ v = t$ that is, pleasing to the spectator, on the same principle, from its opposite tendency.

^c For Aristotle's account of ἐπιεικεια, the reader may confult Eth. Nicom. V. 10. ed. Wilk.

A fingular, but fomewhat fimilar, use is made of the same word in Plutarch's dialogue περι Μεσικης; where, speaking of the wicked innovations of the more modern muficians, Timotheus, Philoxenus, &c. he fays of them— φιλοπαίνοι γεγονασι, τον ΦΙΛΑΝΘΡΩΠΟΝ και θεματικου ΝΥΝ 'ONOMAZOMENON διωξαυτες. Μ. Burette's note upon this is perfectly unfatisfactory a. I believe we should read— ΤΟ φιλανθρωπον και ΘΕΑΤΡΙΚΟΝ $-\kappa$. τ. αλ.-i. e. "being lovers of " novelty, they affect what is now termed the pleasing and thea-"trical style." The Theatre, we know, was considered by the purifts of that time, as the great fource of corruption in Music. The reader may fee how Plutarch rails, on this subject, p. 2081, and 2089; where he laments—παντας τες μεσικής άπτομενες προς την ΘΕΑΤΡΙΚΗΝ προταεχωρημεναι μεσαν.—It appears, from his expression, NYN ονομαζομενον, that this was a new and fashionable use of the word φιλανθρωπον; which, from the fense of pleasing to natural benevolence, (as in the passage of Aristotle,) seems to have been extended to fignify, what was pleasing, and grateful, to the popular tafte, in general; in opposition to those more chaste and severe productions of the artist, which aimed only at the gratification of the critical, and the learned. And, indeed, no fort of philanthropy is more common, in all times, and in every art, than that of accommodation to the public tafte.

^a Mem. de l'Acad. des Inferip. vol. xix. p. 325, ett. ed.—In H. Stephens's ed. of Plut. p. 2080.

N O T E 95.

- P. 87. OUR TERROR, BY SOME RESEMBLANCE BETWEEN THE SUFFERER AND OURSELVES.

Thus, in the Rhetoric, it is recommended to the Orator, as one method of exciting terror in his hearers, τες ΌΜΟΙΟΥΣ δεκενυναι πασχοντας, ή πεπουθοτας . Aristotle's doctrine concerning the importance of this resemblance to ourselves in the object of the pasfion to be excited, and the extent he gives to the word ourse, may be feen in the passages of his Rhetoric referred to in the margin b. The refemblance, however, bere particularly meant, is undoubtedly refemblance of character. This is well explained by M. Batteux in few words: "Un crime atroce, un horreur de scelerat, " revolte le spectateur, et par cette revolte même, le rassure contre " la crainte; parcequ'il se sent aussi eloigné du malheur, qu'il "l'est du crime." [Quatre Poetiques, tom. i. p. 307.] Or, as it is more fully developed by Piccolomini, "Riputando, per il più, "gl'uomini se stessi buoni, o almeno non cattivi, ed in somma, " non degni di male; e, per conseguente, dissimili à quelle persone "inique, in cui veggon' il male, et in questo differenti da esse, che elle "lo meritano, ed effi non lo meritano: non vengon' à dubitar di " cadere in tai mali, et, conseguentemente, non ne nasce timore in "loro." p. 194.

a II. 5.

b Ubi supra. Cap. viii. p. 559, E.-Cap. x. init.

N O T E 96.

P. 87. Nor yet involved in misfortune by delibe-RATE VICE, OR VILLAINY; BUT BY SOME ERROR OF HUMAN FRAILTY.

Μητε δια κακιαν και μοχθηριαν μεταβαλλων εις την δυςυχιαν, άλλα δί άμαςτιαν τινα —. Thus, in the Ethic. Nicom. V. 10. p. 69. he uses μοχθηρια, and κακια, as synonymous: and, VII. 9; where he says of μοχθηρια, that it is ΣΥΝΕΧΗΣ πονηρια—a vitious character, disposition, habit, &c.—It also implies deliberate choice and intention, (— όταν δε εκ προαιρεστεως, μοχθηρια, V. 8.) in opposition to άμαςτια, which excludes προαιρεστς, and is ανευ ΚΑΚΙΑΣ. (ibid.)

To understand rightly what the philosopher says in this part of his work on Poetry, and especially his application of his doctrine to such characters as Oedipus and Thyestes, we ought carefully to take his own sense of his own words. For want of this, Dacier confounds himself and his readers in his note about Thyestes. He mistakes Aristotle's sense of άμαρτια. Dacier's "involontaire" includes both ἀμαρτιον, and ἀπροβαλευτον, which Aristotle distinguishes; bis ἀμαρτηματα being not involuntary, but only, not ἐκ προαιρεσεως. See the whole cap. x, of lib. 5, as above. One passage, in cap. ix. of lib. 7, will particularly illustrate Aristotle's examples. Οι ΑΚΡΑΤΕΙΣ (such were Oedipus and Thyestes, men of ungovernable passion,) ΑΔΙΚΟΙ μεν ἐκ ἐισι, (i. e. are not unjust men—not κακοι, μοχθηροι, of bad dispositions, &c.) ΑΔΙΚΟΥΣΙ δε—yet they commit transient and occasional wrong, δια παθώ, as he says elsewhere.

[—] σευρ' ίτ', έλθετε Ως τας ἀδενφας τας δε τας έμας χερας.

The objections made by Corneille, Fontenelle, and other critics, to fuch subjects as that of the Oedipus, which they hold to be improper for Tragedy on account of the supposed fatality of the crimes committed, are well and folidly answered in an excellent note of the Abbé Batteux upon this passage.

N O T E 97.

P. 88. Upon the stage and in the Dramatic contests.

— Επι των σκηνων και των άγωνων—i. e. merely, in the representation. There seems to be no more foundation for the distinction which Dacier here supposes, between σκηνη, and άγων, than for the same distinction between άγων, and ὑποκριται, in the similar expression, άγων και ὑποκριτων, in cap. vi.

N O T E 98.

P. 88. EURIPIDES—THE MOST TRAGIC OF ALL POETS.

-More, however, it has been observed, with respect to the emotion of pity, than that of terror. And so, Quintilian: "In affec-ь О µег андатия, еюдия от рагода, тдатты бил тав. VII. 2. р. 86.

" tibus

"tibus cum omnibus mirus, tum in iis qui MISERATIONE con"frant, facile precipuus." [lib. x. c. 1.] Yet the powers of this admirable, though unequal, genius, were by no means confined to emotions of tenderness and pity. He, too, as one of "Nature's "darlings," possessed that "golden key," which can not only "ope "the facred source of sympathetic tears," but can "unlock" also, and at the same time, the "gates of borror," and of "thrilling "fears." As proofs of this, I am tempted to produce two passages of this Poet, which I could never read without shuddering.

In that scene between Medea and Jason, in which, previous to the execution of her horrid vengeance, she deludes him with feigned reconciliation and submission, when Jason, addressing the children, says, Ιδοιμι δ' ύμας ευτραφεις ήθης τελ. Μολουτας, έχθρων των έμων ύπερτερες.

—Medea turns away her face and weeps: and when Jason asks the reason of her tears, she answers, Ουδεν: - τεκνων τωνδ' εννοεμενη περιδ.

"And why," fays Jason again, "lament thus over these children?"—Medea, then, knowing, but veiling in ambiguity, her dreadful purpose of destroying them, replies, Ετικτον αυτες:—ΖΗΝ Δ' ΌΤ' ΈΞΗΥΧΟΥ ΤΕΚΝΑ, ΕΙΣΗΛΘΕ Μ' ΟΙΚΤΟΣ, ΕΙ ΓΕΝΗΣΕΤΑΙ ΤΑΔΕ!

v. 930.

- "I am their mother:-when thy wish was breath'd
- "That they might live, a piteous thought arose,
- "If that might be!"—— Potter's Eurip. v. 1000.
 - a "O may I fee you blooming in the prime
 - "Of manhood, and to every virtue train'd,
 - "Superior to my foes!" [Mr. Potter's Transl. v. 989.]

^{5 &}quot; Nothing: - I was but thinking of my fons."

The other passage is in the Electra. In the fine scene between Orestes and Electra, immediately after the murder of their mother, Orestes asks his sister, Κατειδες διον ά ταλαιν' έων πεπλων Εβαλεν, εδείξε, μαςον εν φοναις;— υ. 1206.

Mark'd you not, how my mother, e'er I struck her, Withdrew her robe, and to our view expos'd The breast that nourish'd us'!

I know not what more can be faid to the praise of Euripides, than, that no one, I believe, can read this scene without being reminded of the MACBETH of SHAKSPEARE.

N O T E 99.

P. 88. THAT WHICH IS OF A DOUBLE CONSTRUCTION, AND ALSO ENDS IN TWO OPPOSITE EVENTS TO THE GOOD, AND TO THE BAD, CHARACTERS.

ΣΥΣΤΑΣΙΣ, ή—ΣΥΣΤΑΣΙΝ έχεσα—i. e. " That confiruction " which has a double confiruction."—Can this be as the author left it? I cannot but suspect the first συςασις to be an interpolation. Without it, all will go on well.— Ή μεν εν—καλλιςα Τραγωδια έκ ταυτης της συστασεως έςι. — — Δευτερα δε, [sc. Τραγωδια,] ή πρωτη λεγομενη ὑπο τινων έςι ή διπλην τε την συςασιν έχεσα,—και τελευτωσα &c.

v. 1338.

[•] The excellent translator of Euripides will pardon my having recourse here to a version of my own, merely for the sake of pointing out more distinctly to the English reader that particular circumstance of the original, which strikes me most. Mr. Potter's lines are,

[&]quot; Didft thou see her, when she drew

[&]quot; Her vests aside, and pared her breasts-

The particle, TE, here, is neglected by most of the commentators and translators, who, accordingly, of two distinct things make one only; understanding Aristotle, by his διπλη συζασις, to mean only a fable that has a double catastrophe, ending oppositely to opposite characters. But the expression is, "that has both a " double construction, and a double catastrophe." διπλην ΤΕ την συς ασω. ΚΑΙ τελευτωσα - κ. τ. αλ. We must not, however, confound this double construction with duplicity of action, and what we call double plots. I believe Castelvetro, who did not let the 76 escape him, has explained it rightly. "Dice, the questa constitutione di favola " è doppia, percioche ba due maniere di persone, l'una di buone, o " di mezzane, et l'altra di scelerate." (p. 293.) An explanation that will come still better recommended to the reader by the coincident opinion of the learned and accurate author of Critical Obfervations on Books, antient and modern; who has given the following explanatory version of this passage²: "That constitution " of an Epic tale", which is reckoned the first by some, is in reality "but the fecond in point of excellence, namely, that which, like "the Odyssey, has a double set of characters, one virtuous, and one "vitious, and wherein the action also ends contrarywise to the "virtuous and vitious agents, fo that the former terminate in "prosperity, and the latter in adversity." - These two things, though closely connected, are evidently distinct. There may be a double fet of characters, where yet there is no contrariety of catastrophe, but all ends well to all.—Such a fable, as Aristotle describes, though a very different thing from our plot and under-plot, yet, as it confifts of opposite characters, opposite interests, and opposite events, may well enough be considered as of a double conflruction — διπλης συς ασεως. Unity of action, indeed, upon Aristotle's

^a Number I. p. 3.

b I do not see the learned writer's reason for inserting the word Epic. Aristotle is here plainly speaking of the Tragic sable, though he draws his illustration, indeed, from an Epic Poem.

principles, was effential both to the fingle and to the double fable; yet that unity admits of degrees, and the double fable was left flrietly one action than the fingle. The fingle fable might be compared to a fingle stream: the plot and under-plot, to two separate, though contiguous, and now and then intermingling, streams: Aristotle's fable of double construction, to two opposite collateral currents, (if such a thing may be imagined,) in the same channel:

N O T E 100.

P. 89. This kind of pleasure is not the proper pleasure of Tragedy, but belongs rather to Comedy, &c.

What is the proper pleasure to be expected from Tragedy, we have already been told, and we are told again, more plainly, if poffible, in the next chapter. It is - ή ἀπο έλεν και φοβε ΉΔΟΝΗ: "the pleasure that arises from pity and terror". The double fable Aristotle seems to have considered as not giving this pleasure, or at leaft, as giving it weakly and imperfectly, because all the unhappiness of the catastrophe falls on the odious characters, the σφοδοα ποungers. In the room of this pleasure, which Tragedy ought to give, the double fable fubstitutes that of a fatisfactory conclusion; a catastrophe accommodated to the wishes of the spectator. this, fays Aristotle, is a pleasure that rather belongs to Comedy than to Tragedy: ΜΑΛΛΟΝ της κωμωδίας δίχεια. For he is not here rejecting this double plan, but only shewing why it is not, as some held it to be, the best, πρωτη. Such Tragedies, he says, afford a pleafure of the same kind, at least, with that which Comedy affords; though Comedy indeed goes farther; for there, all must end well; enemies, as inveterate as Orestes and Ægisthus, ... ust shake hands at last, and the spectator must be dismissed with no impression upon his mind, but that of pure and unmixed pleasure.

If we understand the passage in this way, it will not, I think, be necessary to suppose, what, I own, I was once much inclined to fuppose with Heinsius, that the text is defective; and that, after the word beareus, Aristotle had, originally, mentioned the third and scorft kind of fable, terminating in a happy event to all the characters; to which, and not to the second species, what follows about Comedy was meant to be applied. Very specious reasons might certainly be produced in support of such a conjecture, if it were necessary. But we have no encouragement from MSS. to fuspect any omission, and the passage, as here explained, seems to have little, or no, difficulty. The chief objection is, that what is here faid of Comedy is not applicable to the double Tragic fable, in which there is no reconciliation of enemies, &c. But it was not, I think, intended to be so closely applicable. All that Ariftotle meant must have been, to shew, that the pleasure arising from his fecond species of fable, differed only in degree from that of Comedy; that the circumstance of ending satisfactorily was common to both *.

Chaucer's Monk had the true Aristotelic idea of Tragedy:

Tragedie is to sayn a certain storie, As olde bookes maken us memorie, Of him that stood in gret prosperitee, And is sfallen out of high degree In to miserie, and endeth wretchedly.

But

- " See the note of Heinfius.—Castelvetro supposes Aristotle to be answering a tacit objection—" Why not a happy termination for all the characters, good and bad?" p. 294.
- * The author of one of the arguments to the Orestes of Euripides, says, το δε δραμα ΚΩΜΙΚΩΤΕΡΑΝ έχει την κατασφοφην.
- ^c Canterbury tales, v. 13979. Mr. Tyrwhitt's ed.—Chaucer, however, uses the word Tragely in a loose sense, (as Dr. Burney has observed, Hist. of Mus. vol. iis. p. 320.) for a tragical story. And for this he seems to have Plato's authority:—785 τε ΤΡΑΓΙΚΗΣ

But the knight, and the hoft, were among the $\theta \epsilon \alpha \tau \alpha i$ ASOE-NEIS:

Ho! quod the knight, good fire, no more of this: That ye han faid is right ynough ywis,
And mochel more; for litel hevinesse
Is right ynough to mochel folk, I gesse.
I say for me, it is a gret disese, [uncasiness]
Wher as men have ben in gret welth and ese,
To heren of hir soden fall, alas!
And the contrary is joye and gret solas,
As whan a man hath ben in poure estat,
And climbeth up, and wexeth sortunat,
And ther abideth in prosperitee:
Swiche thing is gladsom, as it thinketh me,
And of swiche thing were goodly for to telle.

NOTE 101.

P. 89. Who make use of the decoration to produce, not the terrible, but the marvellous only—.

One would think, that commentators on Aristotle might find enough in this work to satisfy the keenest appetite for difficulties, without any affishance from their own invention. Yet here, they have contrived to perplex one of the plainest passages that can be found. Nothing can well be clearer than Aristotle's expression:

— δι δε ΜΗ ΤΟ ΦΟΒΕΡΟΝ, δια της εψεως, άλλα ΤΟ ΤΕΡΑΤΩΔΕΣ ΜΟΝΟΝ, παραππευαζοντες.—He is not, as some critics have supposed, examining here three different ways of raising terror, but two only; -by the plot itself, which he justly pronounces to be the best way, and by the obje, the spectacle, scenes, dresses, &c. As for those Poets, he continues, who make use of the edge, for the purpose of exciting, not terror, but avonder only, they are out of the question; this " bas nothing to do with Trayedy," &c. If Aristotle, by researades, had meant only, as has been understood, a monstrous degree of the terrible-" mostruoso, soprano spavento," as Castelvetro calls it b, he surely would not have used so strong an expression as—ΟΥΔΕΝ τη Τραγωδια ΚΟΙΝΩΝΟΥΣΙΝ. He does not here exclude even the τερατωδες, absolutely, and in general; but the mere τερατωδες; τερατωδες MONON—" only the wonderful;" and that, dia The chews. The marvellous and supernatural, may, we know, in the hands of a Poet of genius, be made a powerful instrument of Tragic terror. Aristotle would hardly, I imagine. have cenfured a drama like that of Macbeth, as having "nothing " in common with Tragedy."

ΤΡΑΓΙΚΗΣ ποιησεως άπτομενες, εν λαμβειοις, ΚΑΙ ΕΝ ΕΠΕΣΙ. Rep. x.—And so presently after,—'ΟΜΗΡΟΥ, ή και άλλε τιν ΤΩΝ ΤΡΑΓΩιΔΙΟΠΟΙΩΝ: and he calls Homer πρωτον των τραγωδιοποιων. See, also, p. 152, E. ed. Serr. vol. i.

⁴ v. 14773, &c.

² Robortelli, Castelvetro, Piccolomini, Beni.

The difficulty, indeed, of managing the visible τερατωδες, so as to produce any serious effect, is sufficiently great. We have, I think, but one dramatic Poet who could walk, though others may have dared to walk, "within that circle." The decoration of the Eumenides of Æschylus, and his chorus of sifty suries, with their μυγμοι, and their ωγμοι', their snorings, their screams, and their torches, may very well be conceived to have put women and children in a real fright; but whether it produced any sympathetic, illusive, and pleasurable, terror—the only terror in question —I should much doubt. Yet Dacier, very gravely, produces this story of children fainting away, and women miscarrying, with the fright, as an example of Tragic terror excited by the εψις'. Acc See v. 116, &c.

^b P. 298. M. Batteux follows this interpretation. He translates τερατωθες, "ef-"frayant."

d See Dr. Campbell's Philof. of Rhetoric, book I. ch. ii. p. 323.

P. 213, and 47, note 36.—The flory is told by the anonymous writer of the life of Æfchylus:—ώσε τα μεν νηπια ἐκψυξαι, τα δε ἐμβρυα ἐξαμβλωθηναι.

Cording to Dacier's account, the allegorical personage of Λυτσω, or Madness, in the Hercules Furens of Euripides, appears in the aerial car, "with a hundred heads, round which his a thousand served. It is rather difficult to conceive how this could have been managed. These hundred heads, in the passage of the chorus alluded to, v. 884, certainly belong to the scripents, not to Λυσσω herself; and the emendation of Reiske scems probable; — ἐνωτογκεφωλοις Οφεων λωχημασι.—" centicipitibus serpentum sibilis." Even so, I can scarce imagine an Athenian audience to have received this exhibition with countenances persectly Tragic. The arrival of old Ocean mounted upon his Grissin, in the Prometheus of Æschylus, must, one would suppose, have had as ridiculous an effect, as I remember the entrance of the Minotaur to have had upon the audience, some years ago, in the opera of Teseo.

If fuch a dramatic entertainment as our Pantomine had existed in the days of Ariftotle, he would probably have represented the Tragic Poets, whom he here censures, as encroaching on that province: for, indeed, the τερατωδες μονον δια της όψεως παρασκευαζοprevou, would accurately enough express the hoovy diversu of the pantomime.—But, what would the philosopher have said to a species of the drama, of which the O/15, which he places at the very bottom of his scale [cap. vi.], is the very foul—apxn nai of hor furn: and where the onewords, or the carpenter, takes the lead of the Poet? —To do it justice, however, it has its Mulls, its fable, such as it is, with its beginning, its middle, and its end; though a spectator may be often puzzled to make, as we commonly fay, head or tail of its plot. It has also its dever and its huver, its næuds and its denouemens, in great abundance; being, indeed, from beginning to end, a continued feries of knots, tied by love, and cut by magic. Here are also περιπετειαι and αναγνωρισεις, revolutions, and discove-d P. 215.

[•] See the Ox. Euripides, ries, in plenty; though the chief revolution, indeed, be in the feenery; -- ή εις το εναντιον των ΌΡΩΜΕΝΩΝ μεταβολη. And with respect to discoveries, the pantomime may be characterized as Aristotle characterizes the Odyssey, - avayumpireis yap dions -"it abounds throughout with discoveries";" for the poor hero is perpetually discovered, and very seldom eig piliav . Then there are Παθη too, difasters—the πραξεις δουνηραι at least, which, to the upper gallery, make the merriest part of the entertainment. An effential character, the clown, is even appropriated to this purpose of fuffering, and his clothes well wadded for the reception of blows, kicks, and falls . But Aristotle little forefaw, I suppose, when he wrote his first chapter, that a species of drama without words would one day be invented: still less, probably, could he have imagined, what to the antients would have appeared the strangest part of this business, that, though accompanied throughout by Music, yet it would not imitate "by gesticu-" lated rhythm"—δια σχηματιζομενών ΡΥΘΜΩΝ; the gestures of the actors in pantomime, being not at all regulated by the measures of the mufic, or only occasionally, and accidentally, according to the ear, and inclination, of the performer h.

- d Cap. xxiv. Transl. Part III. Sect. 1.
- e Cap. xi.
- f Cap. xii. init.
- *The Germans, not many years ago, were, it feems, fo fond of this fort of bumour, that Dr. Burney tells us, "bills were regularly brought in to the managers at the end of each week, in which the comic actors used to charge; "So much for a flap on the face,"—"So much for a broken head," &c.—See vol. ii. of Dr. Burney's entertaining Journal of a Tour through Germany, &c. p. 223.
- h The pantomimic exhibitions of the Romans, spoken of in NOTE 4, and deferibed pretty fully by Lucian, De Salt. were widely different. They were a species of dance, and the gestures of the performers were strictly governed by the rhythm of the music; the words, which it was the business of the dancer to express by those gestures, being stag, at the same time, by a chorus.

N O T E 102.

P. 90. Most terrible, or piteous ----.

After having established, that the terrible and piteous should arise from the circumstances of the action itself, Aristotle proceeds to examine what are the circumstances that will produce the highest degree of terror and pity, within the proper limits; that is, so as to avoid what he calls the piagor, the shocking, and disgusting. And this, perhaps, led him here to use the words deva, and distreas, as being, if I mistake not, rather stronger than $\varphi_0\beta_{\xi\varphi\alpha}$, and $\lambda_{\xi\varphi\alpha}$. For the subject of this chapter seems, in short, to be, the proper management of the $\Pi\alpha\theta\eta$ or disastrous incidents: "Comment," as Dacier has rightly observed, "on doit se conduire dans les actions "atroces," p. 236. Without this leading idea it would be difficult to explain satisfactorily some passages that follow.

N O T E 103.

P. 90. BETWEEN FRIENDS.

Eν ταις φιλιαις.—For the wide fense in which Aristotle here uses the word φιλια, see Ethic. Nicom. VIII. 1, and 7, ed. Ox. 1716, and the passage quoted in NOTE 276.

N O T E 104.

P. 90. But it is his province to invent other subjects, and to make a skilful use of those which he finds already established.

Αυτον δε έυρισκειν δει, και τοις παραδεδομενοις χρησθαι καλως. The expreffion is too short and general to be clear. It is fairly capable of not less than three different meanings. Euguousu, may mean, to invent a subject from pure imagination, as Agatho invented his ANOON : or it may mean only, to find out a new historical subject; or, lastly, to invent, not a subject, but only circumstances and incidents, by which the old subjects may be varied; which is Dacier's idea: —" Le Poete doit inventer lui-même, en se ser-" vant comme il faut des fables receuës."-I shall only say, that, on the whole, I prefer the fecond of these explanations. Aristotle, it is true, had allowed b, that a Poet ought not to be chained down to the old traditional flories; and even, that it would be ridiculous (γελοιον) to suppose subjects of pure invention absolutely prohibited. But this is delivered as a permission, not as a precept; and he would hardly have enforced a permission by such an expression as he here uses - έυρισκειν ΔΕΙ. Again - ἀυτον ΕΥΡΙΣΚΕΙΝ, (against Dacier's explanation,) feems plainly opposed to τοις παραδεδομενοις XPHΣΘΑΙ — " to use old subjects properly, and to invent or sind " out new subjects: not new incidents for an old subject. may, perhaps, receive some illustration and support from a similar passage in the Rhetoric*. In the fecond chapter of the first book, he divides the proofs of the orator into two kinds—the arexvoi, and a Cap. ix. Transl. Part II. Sect. 6.

b Ibid.

f It is quoted, I fee, by Robortellie the εντεχνοι. The οιτεχνοι are the external proofs; witnesses, the torture, writings, and all such proofs as are ready provided to the pleader's band—όσα μη δι ήμων πεπορισαι, ολλα προϋπηρχεν. The εντεχνοι he defines to be those argumentative proofs which depend on the art and invention of the orator himself. He then concludes—ώσε δει τετων, τοις μεν ΧΡΗΣΑΣΘΑΙ, τα δε ΕΥΡΕΙΝ:—" of these "proofs, the first fort we have only to make a proper use of; the "other we must invent."

N O T E 105.

P. 91. BUT OF ALL THESE WAYS, &c.

All this is not a little embrouillé.—Aristotle describes three ways only. Then he fays, or feems to fay,—" There is no other way:" —παρα ταυτα εκ ές τιν άλλως. And to prove this, he enumerates all the ways possible; which, at last, turn out to be four. Hence the text has been supposed defective. [See Castelvetro; and Goulston's supplemental translation.] Perhaps there is no occasion to suppose this. That, at least, there is no accidental omission of a fourth case, (that of purposing without executing,) seems pretty clear from the expression, ETI de τριτον παρα ταυτα: " there is still a third "way befide thefe." It would have been rather strange, if, immediately after this, he had proceeded to mention a fourth way.— Taking then the passage as perfect, we must understand, I think, by έκ ΕΣΤΙΝ άλλως, not—there is no other way possible—but, there is no other proper, admissible way: non licet aliter—it must not be done in any other way. For, he proceeds, there are but four ways possible; but of all these, (τετων δε—i. e. these four possible ways,) that of being " ready to execute, knowingly, and yet not exe-"cuting," is the worst, and not to be enumerated by a critic among those ways which a Poet may be allowed to use.

Tt

Thus Dacier appears to have understood the passage, by his translation, which, I think, is right, as to the sense. But I thought Aristotle's meaning might be clearly enough expressed without periphrasis, or supplement.

N O T E 106.

P. 92. But the best of all these ways is the last.

In the 13th chapter (Transi. Sect. 12.) Aristotle had pronounced that to be the best constituted Tragedy, which terminates unhappily; and had represented that species, which gratifies, by its catastrophe, the sympathetic wishes of the audience, as inferior, and affording a kind of pleasure rather appropriated to Comedy. here, he appears to give the preference to a plan calculated to afford that very pleasure in the highest degree. This seeming inconsistence has given the commentators much trouble. It is rather furprifing, that Dacier should have perceived what had escaped the fuperior acuteness of the Italian annotators, viz. that Aristotle is not, in this chapter, inquiring what is the best constitution of a Tragic fable in general, but, what is the best method of managing the most disastrous and atrocious incidents of Tragic story, so as to produce the highest possible degree of Tragical emotion in the spectator, without producing horror and disgust *. With this view of the subject, the reader, perhaps, will not see much difficulty in reconciling Ariffotle to himfelf. He might furely fay, without inconfiftence, "Tragedy, to be perfed, should terminate unhap-"pily. Yet there may be particular exceptions to this general "rule. The end of Tragedy is, to excite terror and pity; and "that end is most effectually answered, when those emotions are " not only excited in the courfe of the drama, (as they undoubt"edly may be, and to a high degree, even in such pieces as end "fortunately,) but are lest impressed upon the mind of the spec-" tator by the catastrophe itself. Yet this Tragic terror is not to be pushed to absolute borror, nor the reason to be consounded "with the piager: and I allow, that where the circumstances of the traditional story, from which the Poet takes his plot, are such, as leave him only the alternative, either of disgusting and shocking the spectator, or of gratifying his withes, the latter is clearly to be preferred; and the diama ousans, the double sable, "to which I assigned only the second place +, will, in that particular case, deserve the sirst."

Nothing feems more just, or more accurately expressed, than Aristotle's idea of the end of Tragedy; that it is, " to give that " pleasure which arises from pity and terror through imitation:"-Try απο έλευς και φοβυ δια μιμησεως ήδουην παρασκευαζειν—επρ. xiv. (Tranfl. P. II. Sect. 13.) But the Greek Tragedians will be thought, I believe, by most modern readers, to have sometimes pushed this principle rather too far, and to have excited a degree of horror, which even the charms of imitation cannot well be conceived to have foftened into pleafurable emotion; and it appears to me, that Aristotle himself inclined to this opinion, and that he intended this chapter as a lesson of caution to the Poets against this excess. He feems plainly to have confidered the actual murder of a mother, a fon, a brother, and the like, as incidents rather too horrible to be exhibited in any way. If the deed must be done, let it, he says, if possible—if the story will permit it—be done ignorantly. But it will be still better, if you can avoid doing it, entirely; if you can contrive to make the expectation, combined with the atrociousness of the event expected, answer your purpose, by raising as much anxiety, commiseration, and terror in the spectator, as may consist with that pleafure which is the end of Tragedy, and then relieving him at last, by prevention at the very moment of execution. That + Tranfl. p. 88.

Aristotle thought the end of Tragedy might be sufficiently answered by the mere expectation of such events, properly managed, appears from his expression above:—ἐι ἀδελφω ἀδελφον, ἡ ὑιῶν παντερα, ἡ μητης ὑιον, ἡ ὑιῶν μητερα, ἀποκτεινη, Η ΜΕΛΛΗι—ταυνα ζητηντερν. "When a brother kills, or is going to kill," &cc.

For this purpose, not only the expectation must be such, that the action shall appear imminent and inevitable, but the action itself expected must be such, as, had it taken place, would have been dreadful, "intolrable," &c.—71 700 ANHKESTON", as Aristotle expresses himself in describing these prevented maken. By these means, the emotion of terror is brought as near as possible to that which would arise from the actual perpetration.

If the purport of this chapter has been here rightly explained, the reader will fee how Aristotle has been misrepresented by many modern critics, who have understood him to recommend the Cresphontes of Euripides as a model of the best possible construction of a Tragic sable in general. Thus Massei, in the dedication of his Merope—" Parla di essa Aristotele nella Poetica, dove trattando de' modi di ben comporre la favola, dà per esempio dell' attimo il "Cresssonte d'Euripide, in cui l'atrocità veniva dalla ricognizione "impedita."—And Voltaire, in his letter to Massei, prefixed to the French Merope: "Aristote, dans sa Poetique immortelle, ne

I find the same thing observed by Robortelli, whose short comment is worth' transcribing. "Addit verò Aristoteles—ti tau donnessor: grave enim atroxque sactum "illud in Tragædiis esse oportet, quod aliquis patraturus sermè suerit, quia max—"imum affert auditoribus terrorem, qui proprius Tragædiæ est, et admirationem incredibilem. Aiunt enim, Quid si mactasset?—quàm parum ab fuit à cæde!" p. 160.

b This is well observed, and well expressed, by Piccolomini, (p. 215, &c.) who, with Victorius and other commentators, confesses himself embarrassed by the seeming inconsistence of the author in this passage, and gives the imminence of the perpetration as the only solution that occurs to him. His comment is excellent, but too long for transcription. I had not seen it when my remarks were written; but I was glad to find them so supported.

" balance pas à dire, que la reconnoissance de Merope et de son

" fils, etoit le moment le plus interessant de toute la scene Grecque.

"Il donnoit à ce coup de Theatre la preference sur tous les autres."

N O T E 107.

P. 92. MEROPE, &c.

Plutarch's account of the effect of this coup de Theatre upon the audience, is worth transcribing, though apparently incorrect.

Σκοπει δε την έν τη Τραγωδία ΜΕΡΟΠΗΝ, έπι τον ύιον άυτον, ώς φονεα τε ύιε, πελεκυν άραμενην, και λεγεσαν-

Οσιωτεραν δη τηνδ' έγω διδωμι σοι οσον εν τω θεατρω κινημα ποια, συνεξορθιαζεσα φονε [an, φοβω?] και δεω μη φθωση τον επιλαμβανομενον γεροντα, και τρωση το μειρακιον.-Περι Σαρκοφ. p. 1837, ed. H. St.]

For other fragments of this Tragedy, the reader may fee the Ox. Euripides.

N O T E 108.

P. 92. The manners should be good.

Good, in the usual sense of moral goodness; the only sense which χρηςα, applied to manners, will bear, and which, even though the word would admit of other fenses, would here be fixed, beyond a doubt, by the plain, unequivocal expression of the whole passage. Dacier admires and follows the nonfense of Le Bossu, who makes χρηςα ήθη mean poetically good; that is, well marked by the Poet; in which sense, the rule is equally well observed by Milton in his Satan, and by Richardson in his Grandison. "There are," ac-1 cording to this "best interpreter of Aristotle"," "deux sortes de bonté "dans les mænrs; l'une que l'on peut appeller morale, et qui est "propre à la vertu: et l'autre est la poetique, à laquelle les hommes "les plus vicieux ont autent de part que les gens de bien"." How could Mr. Harris, with his thorough knowledge of the Greek language, and his clear and exact turn of thinking in general, recommend all this, as "a fine and copious commentary on this part " of Aristotle's Poetics"?" I shall not waste time in consuling, what has been sufficiently consuled long ago. —Tis αλκη, τον θατιον τ' επικτων :—Dacier's note is a curious specimen of absurd interpretation supported by false translation".

The best comment I have seen on this passage is that of Heinsius; which I shall therefore give entire.

- "Cæterum, in moribus, quatuor tenenda esse docet Aristoteles; quorum primum est, ut sint boni. Quod est exponendum pluribus.—Inter ea quæ quam maximè in Tragædiâ reprehendebat Plato, vel præcipuum hoc erat;—quod nimirum varia, non uniformis, sit illius imitatio; et occasione oblatâ, probos juxta improbosque imitetur; nonnunquam autem improbos tantum:
 quo facillimè animum, quod supra monebamus, decipi humanum,
- " qui dum folum respicit decorum, quod propositum est illi, bono" rum sæpe, et malorum, discrimen non agnoscit, et, ut ipse Poeta,
 - 4 Harris, On Music, &c. p. 83, note.
 - b Traité du Poeme Ep. lib. iv. c. 4.
- ^c See Philol. Inquiries, p. 166; and Le Bossu, lib. iv. c. 4, 5, &c. to which he refers.
- ⁴ By Mr. De la Barre. See Mem. de l'Acad. &c. his fecond Diff. Sur le Poeme Epique. See also M. Batteux's satisfactory note on this passage.
- Aristotle says plainly, the no will be χρησον, if the προαιρεσις is χρηση, and the contrary:—φαυλον μεν, [sc. now- έξει,] ἐαν φαυλην [sc. προαιρεσιν ποιη φανεραν,] χρησον δε, ἐαν χρησην. See, now, Dacier's version of this: "Il y a des mœurs dans un discours, ou dans une action, lorsque l'un et l'autre font connoître l'inclination ou la resoultion telle qu'elle est, mauvaise si elle est mauvaise, bonne si elle est bonne."
 - ⁵ See De Rep. iii. p. 394, 395, &c. (Ed. Serr.)—the passages here alluded to.

" utrosque mores imitatur; quo nihil magis in republicâ perni-"tiosum excogitari potest. Quippe ratione istà scholam vitiorum, " non virtutum, fieri theatrum; et quidem quanto magis hanc "in partem inclinamus omnes. Præterea, interpretes Platonis-" alium admitti ab eo negant Poetam, quam qui omni varietate " fublata, Deum et bonorum virorum actiones imitetur *; cætera "enim delectare quidem, non autem docere; plerumque vero " mores vitiare ac corrumpere, ideoque nocere magis quam pro-"desse. Huic ut occurreret Philosophus, primum boc de moribus " præceptum esse voluit, probi ut essent; tales enim esse in Tragæ-" diâ non modo posse, quod negabat Plato, sed et, quantum ratio " poematis permitteret, debere. Confirmant hoc exempla tragico-"rum; qui fine ulla lege hanc tamen legem funt secuti. Etiam " posteriores critici, qui nonnullas veterum hoc nomine notârunt, " quod aut omnes, aut plerasque, pessime moratas haberent personas. "Qualis est, ex. grat. Euripidæ Orestes; in quo, præter Pyladen, "improbi omnium funt mores". Neque enim hæc mens Aristo-" telis, aut non alios quam optimè moratos, esse inducendos, aut, " fi alii inducantur, quos fuisse improbos constat, probos iis tribuendos esse mores: sed, ut, quantum ratio permittit, plures optime " morati in eodem inducantur dramate. Quamvis enim et utrique " requiruntur, et tam horum quam illorum ratione constet decorum, " probos tanto esse præferendos, quanto plus conducunt cum " spectantur"."

To do full justice to Aristotle's meaning, it must be observed, 1. That what he says should be understood chiefly, though by no ^{*} Plato fays, the Poets should be obliged, την τε άγαθε έικονα ήθες έμποιειν τοις ποιημέτεις, ή μη παρ' ήμω ποιειν—" to imitate good characters, or not to imitate at all."—Rep. iil. p. 401. B.

E He alludes, I suppose, to the censure passed upon that Tragedy in one of the arguments prefixed: το δραμα των έτι συμνης ευδοκιμεντων, ΧΕΙΡΙΣΤΟΝ ΔΕ ΤΟΙΣ ΗΘΕΣΙ* πλην γαρ Πυλαδε, παντες φαυλοι ήσαν.

h De Trag. conflit. cap. xiv.

means folely, as fome have explained it¹, of the principal characters.

2. That the word X_{ρης} does not imply a character of high and exemplary virtue. It feems to answer to our popular expression, a good fort of man; and it excludes absolutely, only habitual vice, bad disposition, πονηρια, MOXOHPIA, as it is expressed in a passage that should be compared with this ^k.

3. That the rule, even with respect to such characters, is not absolute; as is evident from Aristotle's expression, when he gives an example of the violation of it, παραδαγμα πονηριας ΜΗ ΑΝΑΓΚΑΙΟΝ: and, again, in cap. xxv. όταν ΜΗ ΑΝΑΓΚΗΣ ΟΥΣΗΣ, κ. τ. αλ.—4. That what he presently adds, ἐςι δε ἐν ἑνας ω γενα ¹, is a necessary modification of the precept, and shews, that he did not mean, as Heinsius well observes, to exclude comparative badness of manners, but meant only—as good as may be, consistently with the observance of the other requisites mentioned—the άρμοττον, and the όμοιον.

The reason of the precept, Aristotle has not given us. But, it appears, I think, clearly, from his substituting the word BAA-BEPA (burtful, pernicious,) for $\mu o \chi \theta \eta \rho \alpha$, or $\pi o v \eta \rho \alpha$, in his enumeration of the greatest faults of Poetry at the end of cap. xxv^m . that, however he might differ from Plato as to the hurtful tendency of Tragedy, and of imitative Poetry in general, he so far at least agreed with him, as to admit the danger of those poetical, embellished, and flattering, exhibitions of vice, in which, as one i So M. Batteux; and Marmontel, Poet. Françoise, ii. 181, who defends the true sense of κερικα κόθη, but says, that "the interesting personage of the piece is the only one whom Aristotle had in view." But, Aristotle instances in Menelaus, who certainly is not "le personage interessant," in the Orestes. His instance of slaves, too, shews the precept to be general.

k Cap. xxv. at the end, where this fault in the manners is expressed thus—Ogón δε επιτιμησις —— MOΧΘΗΡΙΑ· ότουν μη ἀναγκης έσης, κ. τ. αλ.—See, Transl. Part IV. Sect. 7.

¹ What he means by γ εν \mathcal{G} , is explained in the Rhot. II. 7.—λεγω δε, ΓΕΝΟΣ μεν, καθ διλικιαν· όιου παις ἡ άτης, ἡ γερων.—και γυνη και ἀνης·—και Λακων, ἡ Θετταν \mathcal{G} , &c.

Trans. Part IV. Sect. 7 .- See, NOTE 260.

of the most eloquent, and I might add, the most Platonic , of modern writers expresses it, -" L'auteur, pour faire parler chacun " selon son caractere, est forcé de mettre dans la bouche des me-" chants leurs maximes, et leurs principes, revetus de tout l'eclat des beaux vers, et debités d'un ton împosant et sententieux, pour "l'instruction du parterre"." With respect to characters of atrocious villainy, fuch as that of Glenalvon in Douglas, which can excite only pure detestation, I believe the ideas of Plato, and perhaps of Aristotle, were very nearly, if not exactly, the same. which this admirable writer has expressed in the concluding note of his Nouvelle Eloise.- "En achevant de relire ce recueil, je crois " voir pourquoi l'interêt, tout foible qu'il est, m'en est si agréable. " et le sera, je pense, à tout lecteur d'un bon naturel. C'est qu'au " moins ce foible interêt est pur et sans melange de peine; qu'il " n'est point excité par des noirceurs, par des crimes, ni melé du " tourment de hair. Je ne sçaurois concevoir quel plaisir on peut " prendre à imaginer et composer le personnage d'un scelerat, à se " mettre à sa place tandis qu'on le représente?, a lui prèter l'éclat le " plus imposant. Je plains beaucoup les auteurs de tant de "Tragédies pleines d'horreurs, lesquels passent leur vie à faire agir " et parler des gens qu'on ne peut écouter ni voir sans souffrir," &c.

n On this subject especially. See his whole letter to M. D'Alembert against the establishment of a Theatre at Geneva.

[°] Lettre à D'Alembert, p. 54.—Plato, after citing some verses of Homer which he conceived to have a pernicious tendency, says, that he reprodutes them— 3χ ώς & ποιητικα και ήδεα τοις πολλοις άκμειν, άλλ' ΌΣΩι ΠΟΙΗΤΙΚΩΤΕΡΑ, ΤΟΣΟΥΤΩι ΗΤΤΟΝ ΆΚΟΥΣΤΕΟΝ παισι και ἀνδρασι, &c.—De Repub. iii. circ. init.

P In Plato's figurative and expressive language—ἐαυτον ἐκματτειν τε και ἐκςαναι ἐις τως των κακιονων τυπες. Rep. iii. p. 396.—And see before, p. 395, C. D.

 $N = O_{\text{total}}^{\text{total}} = \sum_{i=1}^{N} \frac{1}{N_i} \sum_{i=1}^{N} \frac{1}{N_i} = \sum_{i=1}^{N} \frac{1}{N_i} \sum_{i=1}^{N} \frac{1}{N_i} = \sum_$

P. 92. IN GENERAL, WOMEN ARE, PERHAPS, RATHER BAD THAN GOOD.

"Aristote," says M. Batteux, " ne parle pas ici des semmes en gé"néral, mais seulement de celles que les Poètes ont mises sur le "Théâtre, telles que Medée, Clytemnestre," &c. This is polite; but it will not make Aristotle polite. He speaks plainly; and what he says is, I sear, but too conformable to the manner in which the antients usually speak of the sex in general. At least, he is certainly consistent with himself: witness the following very curious character of women in his History of Animals, which I give the reader, by no means for his assent, but for his wonder, or his diversion.

Γυνη, αὐδο ἐλεημονες ερον και αριδακου μαλλον ἐτι δε φθονερωτερον τε και μευθυσιος στος και ΦΙΛΟΛΟΙΔΟΡΟΝ μαλλον, και ΠΛΗΚΤΙΚΩΤΕ-ΡΟΝ ἀτι δε και δυσθυμον μαλλον—και δυσελωι, και ΑΝΑΙΔΕΣΤΕΡΟΝ ΚΑΙ ΨΕΥ ΔΕΣΤΕΡΟΝ, ἐυσ το τητοτερον τε, και μυγμονικωτερον ἐτι δε, ΑΓΡΥ ΙΝΟΤΕΡΟΝ ὁ ΚΑΙ ΘΚΝΗΡΟΤΕΡΟΝ και όλως ἀκινητοτερον κ. τ. αλ —[De Hift. Animal. lib. ix. cap. 1.]

To make the reader amends for the pain which this cool and ferious invective of the philosopher and the naturalist may have given him, I cannot resist the temptation of presenting him with a specimen of more sportive satire on this subject, in a very plea-

² Πωμετικωτερον (i. e.) ΥΒΡΙΣΤΙΚΩΤΕΡΟΝ, fays Hefychius. I am afraid the word means what it fays. Jul. Pollux gives it as one of the epithets of a boxer. We might translate it, with well-bred ambiguity—" more firiking."

b i. e.—" more able to keep late hours, and, at the same time, more lazy, than men," fant fragment, preserved by Athenœus, from a Comedy of Eubulus.

Ω Ζευ πολυτιμητ', ει κακως έγω ποτε
Ερω γυναικας, νη Δι' ἀπολοιμην άρα.
Παντων άριςον κτηματων. είδ' έγενετο
Κακη γυνη Μηδεια, Πηνελοπεια δε
Μεγα πραγμ'.—έρει τις ώς Κλυταιμνηςρα κακη;
Αλκηςιν ἀντεθηκα χρηςην.—άλλ' ίσως
Φαιδιαν έξε κακως τις —άλλα, νη Δια,
Χρης η τις ήν μεντοι——τις;—διμοι, δειλαιω.
Ταγεως γε μ' ή ΧΡΗΣΤΑΙ ΓΥΝΑΙΚΕΣ έπελιπον.
Τωνδ ἀυ ΠΟΤ ΙΡΩΝ έτι λεγεν πολλας έχω.

If ever against woman-kind I rail,

Great Jupiter confound me!—for of all

The good things of this world, they are the best.

Medea, you will say, was bad:—agreed;

But, what a jewel was Penelope!

Urge you the wicked Clytemnestra?—I,

Oppose the good Alcestis.—If you tell me

Of Phadra,—I remind you of the good,

—Stay, let me see—the good—Alas! how soon

My memory fails me there; while, of the bad,

Examples in abundance still occur.—

See Athen. p. 559, or the Excerpta ex Trag. &c. of Grotius, p. 657.

N O T E 110.

P. 93. RESEMBLANCE ---- A DIFFERENT THING, &c.

The words, $\omega \sigma \pi \epsilon \rho$ $\epsilon i \rho \eta \tau \alpha i$, are embarrassing; for the difference here spoken of had not been mentioned before, as the expression, in its most obvious sense, implies. The only meaning I can find is U u 2

The two requisites, the agnotrov and the onoiou, propriety, and refemblance, might eafily be confounded; the ourse being indeed only the apportor in another point of view. The violence and fierceness of Medea, for example, which form her bistorical, or traditional character, and, therefore, the likeness of the Poet's picture, may be said to be αρμοττοντα, proper or fuitable, with respect to the individual, though επρεπη και μη άρμοττοντα, improper and unsuitable, to the general character of the fex.—And thus Piccolomini:-" la terza conditione che assegna Aristotele à i costumi, " la qual consiste in esser simile, non differisce della seconda, posta " nell' esser convenevoli, in altro, se non che la conditione del con-"venevole riguarda l'univerfale; com' à dire, che quel costume " convenza ad un principe, quello ad un fuddito, quello à l'uomo " &cc.—fenza confiderar questa particolar persona, ò quella: et la " conditione del simile riguarda il particolare; come à dire, qual " costume convenga di porre in uno che habbia da rappresentar' " Achille; qual in quello che habbia da representare Oreste," &c. (p. 220.)

Indeed, Aristotle would hardly have thought of admonishing the reader not to confound the two things, had he not seen that they were liable to be confounded. He would not have remarked, that they were different, had they been perfectly, and obviously, distinct. I think then, that the words, wo mey eight and, must refer only to the acquortor, and the meaning must be, that, to make the manners like, is a different thing not only from making them good, but even from making them proper, in such a way as had been said—in that sense, in which the word acquortovta had just been used, and explained by his instance. But if we understand the passage thus, there should be no stop after mornous.

² By Piccolomini's version, (for he says nothing about this difficulty in his commentary,) it appears that he understood the passage as I do: "— essendo cosi satta "conditione diversa dall' esser' i costumi formati buoni, et ancora convenevoli nel modo "che già si é dette."

But, why does Aristotle mention at a'l, a difference so very obvious as that between resemblance, and goodness, of manners?—These two requisites could not easily be consounded, any more than likeness and beauty in a portrait. There was more danger of a reader's thinking the species too different from the $\chi_{g\eta 500}$, and, as a general precept, incompatible with it. And so indeed he seems to have apprehended himself, by what he presently after says about the $\mu \mu \mu \eta \sigma \iota \varsigma$ $\beta \epsilon \lambda \tau \iota \iota \iota \upsilon \omega \nu$, and his rule, that the Poet, in imitation of the painter, should exhibit his characters as much better than they were, or are supposed to have been, as is consistent with the preservation of the likeness.

NOTE III.

P. 93. Though the model of the Poet's imitation be some person of ununiform manners, still that person must be represented as uniformly ununiform.

Τεταρτον δε, το δμαλον κ'αν γαρ ανωμαλω τις ή, ό την μιμησιν παρεχων και τοικτον ήθω ὑποτιθεις, όμως όμαλως ανωμαλον δει είναι.---- which last words," says an eminent writer, "having been not at all understood, have kept his interpreters from seeing the true sense and scope of the precept. For they have been explained of such characters as that of Tigellius in Horace; which, however proper for satyr, or for farcical Comedy, are of too fantastic and whimmical a nature to be admitted into Tragedy; of which Aristotle must there be chiefly understood to speak, and to which Horace, in this place, alone confines himself. Tis true, indeed, it may be said, that "though a whimsical or fantastic character be improper for Tragedy, an irresolute one is not. Nothing is finer than a struggle between different passions; and it is perb At the end of this Sect. of the translation; and of cap. xv. of the original.

" fectly natural, that in fuch a circumstance, each should prevail 46 by turns."-But then there is the widest difference between the "two cases. Tigellius, with all his fantastic irresolution, is as " uniform a character, as that of Mitio. If the expression may be "allowed, its very inconfishency is of the effence of its uniformity. "On the other hand, Electra, torn with fundry conflicting paffions, " is most apparently, and in the properest notion of the word, "ununiform. One of the strongest touches in her character is "that of a high, heroic spirit, sensible to her own, and her fa-"mily's injuries, and determined, at any rate, to revenge them. "Yet no fooner is this revenge perpetrated, than she softens, re-"lents, and pities. Here is a manifest ununiformity, which can, "in no proper sense of the expression, lay claim to the critic's " όμαλου, but may be fo managed, by the Poet's skill, as to become " confistent with the basis or foundation of her character, that is, " to be oualws aromalor. And that this, in fact, was the meaning " of the critic, is plain from the fimilar example to his own rule, "given in the case of Iphigenia: which he specifies (how justly, "will be considered hereafter) as an instance of the avamals, "irregular, or ununiform, character, ill-expressed, or made incon-"fiftent. So that the genuine fense of the precept is, "Let the "manners be uniform; or, if ununiform, yet confiftently fo, or " uniformly ununiform:" exactly copied, according to the reading "here given, by Horace. Whereas in the other way, it stands "thus: "Let your characters be uniform, or unchanged; or, if "you paint an ununiform character (fuch as Tigellius) let it be " ununiform all the way; i. e. fuch an irregular character to the "end of the play, as it was at the beginning; which is, in effect, "to fay, let it be uniform:" which apparently destroys the latter " part of the precept, and makes it an unmeaning tautology with " the former"."

² Comment. on the Ep. to the Pifos, &c. vol. i. p. 104, &c.

I have given this passage entire, that the reader may have it fully in his power to judge, for himself, whether I mistake or mistrepresent the meaning of any part of it. I should be forry to be thought capable of a perfect considence in my own opinion, however carefully and deliberately formed, when it is opposed by that of such a writer. But, after having repeatedly considered this comment, as it certainly deserves to be considered, with all the attention my power, I am obliged to confess, that it does not satisfy me, and that the common interpretation still appears to me to stand its ground.—My reasons are these:

1. I cannot think, that fuch change, irrefolution, and temporary inconfistence as arises from "conflicting puffions," comes under the meaning of Aristotle's 'HOOE ανωμαλον.—Hes, is the prevailing disposition, the habitual mposiperis, or settled character. "Elec-"tre," it is faid, "torn with fundry conflicting passions, is most "apparently, and in the properest sense of the word, ununiform." Not fo; I think, in diriglotle's fense of the word arwhars, as exprefsly applied by him here to you, or manners. The irregularities of conduct, or of fentiment and speech, arising from passion, seem to be a diffiner thing from such as imply a change of the fixed, prevailing inch, or characteristic manners of the person. When such paffionate ununiformity as that above described in Electra, is so managed by the Poet's skill, " as to become confiftent with the basis or " foundation of her character," that character is not, then, I think, as the ingenious critic confiders it to be, δμαλως ονωμαλον, i. e. (as it is expressed in the beginning of the following note, p. 127.) "an " ununiform character justly sustained, or, uniformly ununiform:" it is not, if I understand Aristotle rightly, α.ωμαλον at all, in his fense; for he speaks only of anomalous manners; and anomalous manners, plainly, cannot be made "confiftent with the basis or " foundation of a character," in any other sense, than as that very anomaly itself emplitutes the character. And this I take to be Aristotle's meaning: for he is speaking of that anomaly, in which different

- different characters, not, in which "different passions, prevail by turns."
 - 2. The very expression,—π'αν γαφ ΑΝΩΜΑΛΟΣ ΤΙΣ η ο την μιμησιν παφεχων, και ΤΟΙΟΥΤΟΝ ΗΘΟΣ υποτιθεις, seems plainly to indicate an ununiform character, such as he explains by the ομαλως ανωμαλον that follows.—ανωμαλω ΤΙΣ—an anomalous person: i. e. a person of inconsistent manners, or character. This expression seems hardly applicable, without violence, to such casual and merely apparent inconsistence, as arises from consisting passions, and is reconcilable with "the basis or foundation of a cha"racter."
 - 3. "The genuine sense of the precept," we are told, "is, Let "the manners be uniform; or, if ununiform, yet consistently so, "or uniformly ununiform." But, consistently, and uniformly, seem to present different ideas. Aristotle's word, δμαλως, presents only the latter of these:—uniformly—that is, more literally, equally *, evenly, &c. it does not, I think, answer at all to consistently, in the sense in which it is evidently applied, in this explanation, to what is not incongruous—not unaccountable, &c. Had this, therefore, been Aristotle's meaning, he would, probably, have used, either εικοτως, or ευλογως, or some other such word appropriated to that meaning; not δμαλως, which is never, as far as I know, used in the sense of consistently.
 - 4. But it is objected, that if we take ὁμαλως ἀνωμαλον to mean "uniform all the way, i. e. fuch an irregular character to the end "of the play, as it was at the beginning," this, "is, in effect to fay, let it be uniform; which apparently destroys the latter
 - * In Horace's character of Tigellius, lib. i. fat. 3. "Nil EQUALE," is, solv 'OMA-AON. And so, "Vixit INEQUALIS"— άνωμαλΦ, in fat. 7. lib. ii. of PRISCUS, another character of the same stamp, "VERTUMNIS, quotquot sunt, natus iniquis." v. 14.

b Thus, in the next note—" All these considerations put together, Electra might "affift at the assassing tion of her mother, consistently with the strongest feelings of "picty and assection." Notes on the Ep. to the Pisos, p. 112.

" part of the precept, and makes it an unmeaning tautology with "the former."—The first part of the precept, I think, is, Let the manners be uniform; or, as we fay, of a piece. Now to this an objector might fay,—" This cannot be an indifpenfable "rule; uniformity cannot be effentially requifite to the manners: " for, what, if the Poet should take for the subject of his imita-"tion a person whose manners are not uniform?"—The answer, or "fecond part of the precept," is,-" then, that want of uni-"formity must be such as constitutes the very character itself; for "this falls within the rule; the "very inconfiftency" of the cha-" racter (to use the ingenious critic's own words,) being, in this case, " of the essence of its uniformity." I confess I do not here perceive any thing that can properly be called tantology; for though the philosopher says, indeed, in the second part of the precept no more than he meant to fay in the first; yet he plainly apprehended it was more than he might be understood to say, and therefore he fubjoined this necessary explanation. What he says is, in short, only this—" Let the manners be uniform: an ununiform character " is no exception to this rule"."

The Tigellius of Horace offered himself naturally enough, upon this occasion, to the commentators, as an illustration. We need not, however, suppose Aristotle to have thought of so very fantastic and comic a species of incoherence. Mutability and caprice are sometimes found in higher characters, where they are less ludicrous in their appearance, and, sometimes, very serious in their effects. And though, perhaps, any character of the kind may have too much of a comic cast to accord with our ideas of Tragic dignity, we have no reason to conclude, that it would have found the same dissibility of admittance upon the Greek stage, where the Tragic muse did, not unfrequently, condescend to be seen, " Δα-μουσεν γελασασα."

Le Bossu observes, very well, in explaining this rule, that whenever the Poet admits this inequality of manners, "il doit bien faire remarquer aux auditeurs, que "cette inegalité est un caractere qu'il donne exprés à un personnage." Livre iv. ch. 7. The following comparison is no unhappy illustration of Aristotle's precept. "Il "arrive quelquesois qu'une même personne est egale et inegale (burdes, àraquate) en "même tems. Parceque le caractere, qui dans la plus-part des hommes ressemble au foleil, dont l'égalité consiste à paroitre tojours le même, en d'autres ressemble à la "lune, dont l'égalité n'est qu' à changer quatre sois de seces en un mois — Ib. p. 450.

I shall only add to this note the following passage from the commentary of Victorius, which appears to me to explain well, in few words, the meaning, and the spirit, of Aristotle's precept.

"Studens ostendere quantopere hoc præceptum custodiendum stit, assirmat, si quis sortè—varius dissimilisque sibi inductus se semel sit, eum, talem in omni sacto totius sabulæ servandum esse, su acquabilitas à Poetà custodiatur in natura illà inæquabili ostendendà: quod non sieret, si aliquis levis, nec in eodem proposito permanens, inductus, paulò posteà firmus et obstinati animi se constanter. Si morum igitur inæqualitas naturæque inconstantia constanter servanda est, quanto magis natura indolesque slabilis, par sibi ac jugis ad extremum servari debet."

N O T E 112.

P. 93. WE HAVE AN EXAMPLE OF MANNERS UNNECES-SARILY BAD, IN THE CHARACTER OF MENELAUS, &c.

Mr. Potter, in the introduction to his translation of the Orestes, says of this passage, that it "may be considered as a mysterious "oracular sentence, which wants an expounder." I can only say, that I think the commentators would have reason to congratulate themselves, if no tentence of this mangled work wanted an expositor more than this. Whether we read ἐναγκαιον, οτ ἀναγκαιον;—an unnecessary example of bad manners, or an example of unnecessary badness of manners; the sense evidently the same: and that Aristotle could not mean, what the excellent translator of Æschylus and Euripides seems to think he might mean—to "excuse the Poet upon the necessity"—sufficiently appears from another another passage, at the end of the 25th chapter, [Transl. Part IV. Sect. 7.] where this character is again mentioned as an instance of vitious manners, excused by no necessity—un avaying ecos.—Mr. Potter complains of "the little light which the passage derives from the connexion:" I think without reason. For as the other examples given are examples of the violation of his other precepts, relative to propriety, and uniformity, of manners, the connection plainly indicates this to be an example of the fimilar violation of his first rule—that the manners should be good. So far, then, seems to be clear. In what particular view Aristotle thought the badnets of the character not necessary, may be, indeed, less clear. I should suppose him to mean, that the historical, or traditional, character of Menelaus, and the observance of the outlook, by no means obliged Euripides to paint him in fuch colours. With respect to the plea, that it was necessary, because "the drama could not," otherwise, "have been worked up to this terrible height of Tragic diffrefs," Aristotle's answer would, perhaps, have been similar to that which he makes upon another occasion:—i. e. the Poet should not, originally, have so constructed his plan, as to bring upon himself the necessity of committing so great a fault: - if dogge yas i be ourses = θαι τοιυτυς. [[c. μυθυς]. εαρ. ΧΧίν.

N O T E 113.

P. 93. OF UNUNIFORM MANNERS, IN THE IPHIGENIA AT Aulis, &cc.

"How does this appear, independently of the name of this great critic? Iphigenia is drawn indeed at first, fearful and fuppliant: and furely with the greatest observance of nature. The account of her destination to the altar was sudden, and without the least preparation: and, as Lucretius well observes, in commenting her case, NUBENDI TEMPORE IN 1950; when X x 2

" her thoughts were all employed, and, according to the fimplier city of those times, confessed to be fo, on her promised nuptials. "The cause of such destination too, as appeared at first, was the " private family interest of Menelaus. All this justifies, or rather "demands, the strongest expression of female fear and weakness. "But flie afterwards recants and voluntarily devotes herself to " the altar." And this, with the same strict attention to proba-66 bility. She had now informed herfelf of the importance of "the case. Her devotement was the demand of Apollo, and the " joint petition of all Greece. The glory of her country, the "dignity and interest of her family, the life of the generous 44 Achilles, and her own future fame, were, all, nearly concerned in it. All this confidered, together with the high, heroic "fentiments of those times, and the superior merit, as was be-"lieved, of voluntary devotement, Iphigenia's character must " have been very unfit for the diffress of a whole Tragedy to turn " upon, if the had not, in the end, discovered the readiest sub-" mission to her appointment. But, to shew with what won-44 derful propriety the Poet knew to fustain his characters, we "find her, after all, and notwithstanding the heroism of the "change, in a strong and passionate apostrophe to her native " Mycenæ, confessing some involuntary apprehensions and regrets, "the remains of that instinctive abhorrence of death, which had " before so strongly possessed her.

Εθρείνας Ελλαδι μεγα φα©—— Θανεσα δ' έκ άναινομαι.

Once the bright flar of Greece-But I fubmit to die.

"This, I take to be not only a full vindication of the confishency of Iphigenia's character, but as delicate a stroke of nature as is, perhaps, to be found in any writer." [Commentary on the Ep. to the Pijos, &c. vol. i. p. 113, &c.]

If all I knew of the Tragedy in question was from this ingenious nious defence, I should certainly acquit Euripides. I cannot acquit him, or can only partially acquit him, when I read the Tragedy The fact perhaps is, that the question, whether the critic's censure be just or not, cannot possibly be decided by any general statement of the case. That Iphigenia, so circumstanced as she is here, and very justly, described to be, might at first be timid and fuppliant, and, at last, meet death with resolution, and this, without any inconfistence, or duplicity of character, will hardly be disputed. But the question is, whether Euripides has actually to drawn this timidity, and this resolution, as to preserve the unity of character. To determine this fairly, we must, at last, have recourse to the detail of the Poet's execution, and the actual impression which, on the whole, it leaves upon the reader's mind. All depends here upon degree and manner. A fingle nuance in the colouring, a flight depression or elevation of tone, in the suppliant, or the heroine, may be fufficient to determine the impression this way, or that. What this impression was upon Aristotle's mind, it may be observed that he has marked very precisely and clearly by the expression, 'OΥΔΕΝ ΕΟΙΚΕΝ 'Η ΊΚΕΤΕΤΟΥΣΑ ΤΗ ΥΣ-TEPH: :- " the supplicating Iphigenia is NOTHING LIKE the Iphi-" genia of the conclusion." The expression, I think, does not imply, that he thought the mere circumstance of her supplicating at first for life, and recanting afterwards, was, of itself, necessarily inconfistent, but, that the manner in which she supplicated was fuch, as to make her, in that part, appear to be a different character, another person, from what she appears to be when she recants.

My own opinion I confess to be, that though the considerations suggested in this ingenious defence of Euripides may prove the censure of Aristotle to be too strongly, or, at least, too generally, expressed, yet they do not prove it to be without foundation. I say, too generally, because without one passage in the speech of the suppliant Iphigenia, to which the OYAEN corker is fairly.

fairly applicable, in its full force. Her speech, Et MEV TON Ogrews, &c. v. 1211, which, on the whole, is highly pathetic, ends with these unhappy lines:

μαινεται δ' ός ἐυχεται
 Θανειν` ΚΑΚΩΣ ZΗΝ ΚΡΕΙΣΣΟΝ Η ΘΑΝΕΙΝ ΚΑΛΩΣ'.

v. 1249.-

I leave it to the reader to determine, whether any intervening circumstances, that can be imagined, will make it at all conceivable, that the fame Iphigenia, should, in the short space of time taken up by the recital of, at most, only 35 lines of dialogue, experience such a total change of sentiments, as to express the most heroic resolution, and the utmost sensibility to the glory of dying for her country; as to say,— — διδωμι σωμα τ' εμον Έλλαδι. Θυετ', έκπορθειτε Τροιαν' ταυτα γαρ μνημεια με, Δια μακρε, και παιδες έτοι, και γαμοι, και δοξ' έμη. υ. 1397'.

² This is foftened in Mr. Potter's version:

- " of his fenses is he rest,

"Who hath a wish to die; for life, though ill,

" Excells whate'er there is of good in death.

v. 1365.

b The reader of Euripides will observe, that Iphigenia continues the same strain of consternation and lamentation after the speech of her father in reply to her supplication; (v. 1255, &c.) and even at v. 1317, she says she dies, "impiously murdered by an impious father:"

Σφαγαισιν άνοσιοισην Ανοσια πατρ.

From the end of this monostrophic lamentation to her heroic speech v. 1368, there are, I think, but 35 lines.

· - - For Greece I give my life.

"Slay me, demolish Troy: for these shall be "Long time my monuments, my shidren thefe,

"My nuptials, and my glory."

Potter's Eurip. v. 1549.

It feems probable, that Aristotle had chiefly in view the particular lines I have quoted; and had he any way pointed his censure to that passage—had he said, when some $\hat{\eta}$ OTT $\Omega\Sigma$ instructa, &c. quoting, or referring to, the verses, I think there could have been no objection to the justice of his criticism.

Gravina, who has also defended Euripides in his book Della Tragedia, lays great stress upon a circumstance, which does, indeed, seem to be of considerable moment in the Poet's justification; I mean, the effect of necessity in producing courage and resolution. "Non é maraviglia, se Isigenia, quantunque per naturalezza del sessio, timida, ed amorosa della vita, sinchè la poteva sperare; poi resa forte dalla necessità, madre spesso anche delle virtù morali, come anima generosamente educata, disprezza la morte, e cangia l'amor della vita in compiacenza di gloria. Il che alla giornata anche osserviamo in persone di nascita e d'animo vile, che condotte alla morte, arditamente l'abbracciano, quantunque al primo avviso costernate rimanessero; perchè l'idea della necessità non avea usata ancor la sua forza." [Sect. 19.]

This feems much to the purpose; and it is supported by it; agreement with what we find in the Tragedy itself. For the change in the sentiments and language of Iphigenia is not, as we have seen, produced before the scene in Trochaics between Clytæmnestra and Achilles; the very scene in which the inevitable necessity of the sacrifice is first made clearly apparent. The effect of this on the resolution of Iphigenia is visible also in her speech:

τα δ' ΑΔΥΝΑΘ' ήμιν καρτερειν ε ξαδίον.

Αλλα και σε τεθ' ός αν χρη, μη διαβληθης ερατω, ΚΑΙ ΠΛΕΟΝ ΠΡΑΞΩΜΕΝ ΟΥΔΕΝ.

Αλλ' ΑΜΗΧΑΝΟΝ' — διδωμι σωμα τ'εμον Ελλαδι, &c.

v. 1372.

The learned Mr. Markland, in his excellent edition of the two Iphigenias, defends Euripides upon very different ground. He admits the inconfishence, not only in the character of Iphigenia, but in all the characters of the play, except Clytæmnestra; and even in the chorus. But all this he supposes to have been intended by the Poet, as a moral lesson—a striking picture of the world inconstancy of the human mind." And he wonders, which I cannot say I do, that this should have escaped the arxivosa of Aristotle.

N O T E 114.

P. 94. HENCE IT IS EVIDENT THAT THE DEVELOPMENT ALSO, &c.

Heinfius pronounces this whole passage, to the words, ev to Oid.

The Soft.—inclusively, to be certainly out of its proper place. And I should be of his opinion, if such digressive and parenthetical insertions were not very usual with Aristotle. The expression, however, should be observed:— φανερον εν ότι KAI τας λυσεις, &c. that "the development also," &c. i. e. as well as the other incidents of the sable, just mentioned. Most of the versions neglect the word και, which is important, and greatly helps the connection. This digression, however, though not unrelated, is but slightly and obliquely related, to his present subject; and seems introduced rather απο μηχανης, and in violation of his own rule—τετο μετα τετο η αναγκαιον η εναθο. It interrupts the connection, and obscures the purport, of the chapter; and though we allow it to be where the author placed it, we may fairly question, whether he has placed it where it should be.

^d P. 190. Note on v. 1375.

^{*} De Trag. cap. xii.

N O T E 115.

P. 94. MACHINERY.

Aπο μηχανης.—It appears from Jul. Pollux, lib. iv. cap. 19. that the term, μηχανη, was not applied indifcriminately to the machinery of the play-house in general, but was appropriated to that particular machine, in which Gods and Heroes made their appearance in the air. Μηχανη δε, θευς δεικνυσι και ήρωας τυς εν αερι.—I hope it was something better than the Μηχανη of the French opera, so pleasantly described by Rousseau:—

- "Les chars des Dieux et des Déesses sont composés de quatre folives encadrées et suspendues à une grosse corde en forme d'escar-
- " polette; entre ces solives est une planche en travers, sur laquelle
- " le Dieu s'asseye, et sur le devant pend un morceau de grosse toile
- " barbouillèe, qui fert de nuage à ce magnifique char. On voit
- " vers le bas de la machine l'illumination de deux ou trois chan-
- " delles puantes et mal mouchèes, qui, tandis que le personnage se
- " démene et crie en branlant dans son escarpolette, l'enfument
- " tout à fon aise. Encens digne de la divinité .

The account of the machinery of a Greek Theatre, in the chapter of Jul. Pollux above referred to, is curious, and amusing, as far as it is intelligible.

N O T E 116.

P. 94. OR THE RETURN OF THE GREEKS IN THE ILIAD.

Και εν ΤΗι ΙΛΙΑΔΙ τα περι τον ἀποπλεν. It has been disputed, whether Aristotle here speaks of the Iliad of Homer, or of some

* Nouvelle Eloise, Part II. Let. xxiii.

Υv

Tragedy

Tragedy called The Iliad. See Dacier's note.—But, if we suppose the text to be right here, I fee not how we can reasonably reject the first of these interpretations. H IAIA Σ , as Beni has well obferved, can only be, THE Iliad,—i. e. Homer's Iliad. Dacier supposes the Tragedy to have been called, "The Iliad, or, The return " of the Greeks;" and to be that mentioned by Longinus, Sect. 15, and attributed to Sophocles. But, even supposing a Tragedy to be meant, it feems very clear from Aristotle's expression, that the title must have been, 'Η Ιλιας, only; for he says, EN τη Ιλιαδι ΤΑ ΠΕΡΙ τον ἀποπλευ—i. e. " the circumstances, or incidents, relative to the " return of the Greeks, in [the Tragedy of The Iliad."-So, cap. xxiv.—εν τη Οδυσσεια—τα περι την εκθεσιν.—Indeed, The Iliad, taken alone, feems an improbable title for a Tragedy; but Dacier's junction is still more improbable. He might as well have imagined a Tragedy with this title—Η Οδυσσαα, Ή, Ἡ ΕΚΘΕΣΙΣ.— As to the Tragedy of Sophocles mentioned by Longinus, it feems clearly to have been his POLYXENA2.

Supposing, then, the text not to be desective, we cannot, I think, avoid understanding Aristotle to speak of the machinery, (to use the word in his general sense,) in the second book of the Iliad, where Minerva descends to prevent the return of the Greeks. It is true indeed, as has been objected, that an instance drawn from an Epic Poem is not what one would expect here, where the subject is Tragedy; and, that though there be, in this instance, a disficulty solved—a knot cut—yet this house, is not, properly, house, in that sense, in which Aristotle applies the term in cap. xviii. to the sinal denouement of a Tragic sable.—We must therefore suppose him to have produced this, merely as an obvious and well known example of the sort of supernatural interposition, or machinery, that would be improper in the $\lambda \nu \sigma v_5$ of a Tragedy. For, that he intended to censure the "ministeria Deorum," so necessary to the Epic Poem, and so frequent in the great model of all Epic Poems, cannot be imagined without absurdity, and is by no means necessarily implied, as Dacier seems to think, in this interpretation.

^{*} See the note of Ruhnkenius in Toup's Longinus.

[▶] Il. B. 155, &c.

^{*} Transl. Part II. Sect. 18.

Such appears to me to be the only meaning, and the best apology, which the paffage will bear, taking for granted the integrity of the original. But of this, I confess, I doubt. M. Batteux translates-" la petite Iliade." But if we admit that sense, as Ariftotle certainly would not have called that Poem THE Iliad, without diffinction, we must necessarily suppose the text defective, and the word MIKPA; to be omitted^d; and it feems very probable that this was the case. The illustration, indeed, will still be drawn from an Epic Poem; but from one of an irregular and biftoric structure, confifting of a string of ill-united stories, and which seems to have been confidered as a fort of feed-plot, or nurfery, of subjects for the use of the Tragic Poets: so that in referring to it, Aristotle may be understood to refer to such Tragedies as were founded on it; of which he enumerates himself no fewer than eight, and one of these was called ANOHAOYS; taken, I suppose, like the $P_{\theta-}$ Typena of Sophocles mentioned by Longinus, from that part of the Little Iliad, which related the detention of the Greeks in the Thracian Chersonese, and the appearance of the ghost of Achilles demanding the facrifice of Polyxena. See the Hecuba of Euripides, v. 35, &c. and 104, &c.—and the fine description of the facrifice, v. 519, &c.—In Mr. Potter's translation, v. 36—102—501.

^{• —} του ΜΙΚΡΑΝ Ιλιαδα—and, έκ της ΜΙΚΡΑΣ ΙλιαδΘ-. cap. xxiii.

[•] See Aristotle's account of it, cap. xxiii. Transl. Part III. Sect. 1.

N O T E 117.

P. 95. OR OF INDOLENT -.

Pαθυμ©:—indolent—nonchalant. Hefychius explains Pαθυμ©,— 'Ο ΜΗ ΠΟΝΗΤΙΚΟΣ ἀλλ' ΕΚΛΥΤΟΣ. It is improperly rendered,
"timide," by M. Batteux, and "manfueto," by the Italian translators.

N O T E 118.

P. 95. Should draw an example approaching rather to a good, than to a hard and ferocious, character.

The original is—Όυτω και του ποιητην, μιμεμενου και δργιλες και έαθυμες, και τ'αλλα τα τοιαυτα έχοντας έπι των ήθων, έπιεκειας ποιείν παραδειγμα ή σκληροτητ δε: διον τον Αχιλλεα Αγαθων και Όμηρ ...Α passage that has much perplexed and divided the commentators. Of all the explanations which this perplexity has produced, that of Dacier is the most improbable and ill-founded. ράθυμ@ into the sense of, emporté, furieux, and makes it " encherir " fur δργιλ." Επιακαα, he wrenches from the obvious and proper fense in which it is continually used by Aristotle, into that of probability. And the result of this violent operation upon the passage, is the following strange version:—" Il faut tout de même, " qu'un Poete qui veut imiter un homme colere et emporté, ou " quelqu' autre caractere semblable, se remette bien plus devant " les yeux ce que la colere doit faire vraisemblablement (i. e. ἐπιεικειας) " que ce qu'elle a fait (i. e. η σκληεοτητ. !) et c'est ainsi," &c. I may venture to leave all this to the learned reader's rejection, without without any farther comment. I shall only just observe, that the expression, KAI δογ. KAI δωθ. evidently marks different characters; not, as Dacier makes it, different degrees only of the same character.

Heinfius first suggested, that the phrase επιακείας ή συληγοτητώ, was elliptical, and μαλλον to be understood. But in spite of the " Attica venustas," I am much more inclined to suspect an omisfion of the word. Aristotle would hardly have used a mode of expression so unavoidably ambiguous - or rather, that would, almost unavoidably, lead to a wrong sense; for, the fact is, that all the commentators, before Heinfius, understood the η , as indeed every reader, I believe, would at first naturally understand it, in the disjunctive fense of, or. Besides this, I doubt whether any example of this elliptic phrase occurs in Aristotle's works. That it may, I will not take upon me to deny; but it feems, at least, very unusual. An instance of it I have not found; but the reader may find many inftances of the full phrase, μαλλου ή, even in this treatife. However, one, or the other, of these suppositions. it feems necessary to adopt. The passage will then, without forcing the words επιεικεία and σκληροτης from their usual and proper fignification, afford a clear and confiftent meaning. Exterκεια is used, I think, here, as it is in cap. xiii. in the general sense of good b. Σκληροτης plainly relates only to his first instance, of the deguide, the angry character, of which it feems to express the extreme degree. In the Ethics ad Nicom. we have—APPIOI Has ΣΚΛΗΡΟΙ, as fynonymous, or very nearly fo°. A passage of Plato may ferve to illustrate and confirm this fense of the word.

² Cap. i. φυσιολογον ΜΑΛΛΟΝ Η ποιητην.—cap. ix. ΜΑΛΛΟΝ των μυθων—— Η των μετρων.—cap xxiv. προαιρεισθαι τε άδυνατα και είκιστα, ΜΑΛΛΟΝ Η δυνατα και άπιθανα.

b So, in the Rhet. lib. i. cap. 5. ἐπιεικης is plainly used as fynonymous with χερης Φ. For, defining the word χερηςοφινία, he says—ώ δε και ΕΠΕΙΚΕΙΣ ανδρες, [sc. φιλοι ἐισι] ΧΡΗΣΤΟΦΙΛΟΣ.

Lib. iv. cap. 8. ed. Wilk.

Speaking of the θυμοείδες, or irafcible nature, he fays, it may produce the άγριον:—παι δρθως μεν τραφεν, άνδρειον αν είη ΜΑΛΛΟΝ Δ' ΕΠΙΤΑ-ΟΕΝ ΤΟΥ ΔΕΟΝΤΟΣ, ΣΚΛΗΡΟΤΕΡΟΝ τε παι χαλεπον γυγνοιτ' αν, ώς το είνω.—Αnd just before—ΑΓΡΙΟΤΗΤΟΣ τε παι ΣΚΛΗΡΟΤΗ-ΤΟΣ, και αυ μαλακίας τε και ήμεροτητω.

The fense of the passage, then, will be, that, in order to reconcile the first precept, of the xensor, with the third, of the outlow, the character should be brought as near to a good one, as is confistent with the circumstance of likeness. Thus, if such a character as that of Achilles is to be drawn, its striking features are to be preferved, but, at the same time, to be rather improved and softened, than exaggerated. For the expression mustible observed. Aristotle does not fav absolutely, according to the sense of Heinsius, that Achilles ought to be drawn, or was drawn, παραδωγμία επιεπειάς; but rather so than otherwise; MANAON of TRANSOTATO. Loin " de charger encore le defaut, il le rapprochera de la vertu;" as M. Batteux has very well expressed the spirit of the rule, though he has generalized it, and made it refer to all that precedes—xxx οργίλες, και ραθυμες, &c.—whereas it appears plainly, from what has been faid of the force of σκληφοτης, that the words, επιεικείας ποιείν παραδ. ή σκλης. can be applied only to the δογιλοι; for as to the eaθυμω, fuch a character may, indeed, be flattered into the into neinns, but cannot well, by any diffortion, be made to appear σκληρ.

Still, however, what every one, I believe, naturally expects at the first reading of this passage, as it now stands, is, that after having mentioned two instances of faulty characters, the egypton, and the passupen, Aristotle should mention two corresponding instances of good qualities bordering upon, or connected with, each, and of which the Poet might avail himself, to give to each a savourable turn. But, instead of this, we have a good, and a bad quality, (entered, and onlygoths,) both of which, as we have seen, can be made to relate only to his first inflance, the degride; so that all the rest, between the words deriver, and emigrace, must be parenthetical. The harfliness and embarrassiment of such a construction, led me formerly to suspect an error in one of the words, $\epsilon \pi \iota$ εικείας, or σκληροτητ©; and a conjecture was fuggested to me by a paffage in the Rhetoric, which, I hope, will at least be thought plaufible enough to excuse my laying it before the reader. fuspicion seemed to fall upon σκληροτητ. ; for the ἐπιεικεία would answer well enough as a softening, or improvement, of ραθυμια; as an indolent man, who concerns himself about nothing, and cares only for his own eafe, is often spoken of as a quiet, good kind Instead of σκληροτητ, then, I thought it not improbable, that Arithotle might have written άπλοτητ. The passage of Aristotle himself which suggested this to me, is in the first book of his Rhetoric, cap. ix. where, delivering the usual precepts relative to the art of encomiastic misrepresentation, he says,— $\Lambda \eta \pi \tau \epsilon c \nu$ δε---- έκαςον, έκ των παρακολεθεντων αει, κατα το ΒΕΛΤΙΣΤΟΝ διον, ΤΟΝ ΌΡΓΙΛΟΝ και του μανικου, 'ΑΠΛΟΥΝ' και του αυθαδη, μεγαλοπρεπη και σεμνον κ. τ. αλλ. The whole paffage is much to the purpose of this place; and is, plainly, not more applicable to the Rhetorician, with respect to the hero of his oration, than it is to the Poet, with respect to the hero of his poem. A passage of Euripides will add, perhaps, some probability to this conjecture. In the Iphigenia at Aulis, Achilles thus draws his own character:

¹ De Repub. lib. iii. ed. Moss. p. 228.

> Εγω δ' εν ανδριδι ευσεβες ατα τραφεις, Χειρωνιδι, εμαθον τας τροπας ΔΠΛΟΥΣ έχειν. Και τοις Ατρειδαις, ην μεν ήγωνται καλως, Πεισομεθ'. όταν δε μη καλως, ε΄ πεισομεθ'. υ. 926.

Where the meaning of τροπες ἀπλες, is very well fixed by the two fubsequent lines, and by the expression, ἐλευδεραν φυσιν, in the verse that follows them.

Plato, also, in the Hippias, talks much of the fimplicity, truth, and fincerity, of Achilles; as if, in his view, they were the prominent.

minent features of what was good in the Homeric character of that hero. When Socrates asks Hippias, whether Achilles is not represented by Homer as an artful, designing character, Hippias answers—Ημιςα γε, & Σωκρατες, ἀλλ' 'ΑΠΛΟΥΣΤΑΤΟΣ. And, again, &ς ὁ μεν Αχιλλευς ἐιη ἀληθης τε και 'ΑΠΛΟΥΣ' ὁ δε Οδυσσευς πολυτροπω τε και ψευδης°. And the following lines are there quoted, in which Homer has made Achilles strongly mark this feature of his own character:

Διογενες Λαερτιαδη, πολυμηχαν Οδυσσευ, Χρη μεν δη τον μυθον απηλεγεως αποειπειν, . Ήι περ δη φρονεω τε, και ώς τέτελεσμενον έςαι Εχθρω γαρ μοι κεινω όμως αϊδαο πυλησιν, Ος χ' έτερον μεν κευθει ένι φρεσιν, άλλο δε βαζει.

.: Il. ix. 308.

The sense, then, of the passage before us, according to this conjecture, would be this:—If the Poet chuse for the subject of his imitation a passionate, or an indolent man, he should give to the former the cast of plain sincerity, and honest frankness; and to the other, (the easy of that of moderation, gentleness, goodnature, and what the French, by an expressive word which our language wants, term, bonhommie.—But I dwell too long upon a mere conjecture. The evident propriety of the word συληςοτης, as applicable to the unsoftened and unstattered character of Achilles, may justly, perhaps, protect it from suspicion; though, on the other hand, the passages I have adduced, added to the improbability of the ellipse supposed by Heinssus, the embarrassiment of the parenthesis, and the advantage of leaving the n to its most obvious, disjunctive, sense, prevent me from a total rejection of this idea.

The word παραδειγμα, here, is taken by most of the commentators to mean a perfect ideal model*—" fummum exemplar." For [·] Tom. i. p. 364. ed. Serr.

f Exteriors— $\Pi PAO\Sigma$, METPIOS.—Suidas.

Robortelli, Victorius, Piccol. Beni, Gouliton.

this I fee no reason. I take it to be used here, as it is generally, I believe, if not always, used by Aristotle, merely for an example. Of this the reader may easily satisfy himself by consulting the useful index to Mr. Winstanley's edition.

N O T E 119.

· P. 95. As Achilles is drawn by Agatho and by Homer.

Plato, in the third book of his Republic, gives a very different view of the Homeric Achilles. He makes him a mere compound of extreme pride and extreme meannefs: ως ε εχειν εν ωυτω νοσηματα δυο εναντιω αλληλοιν, ανελευθεριαν μετα φιλοχρηματιας, και αν υπερηφανιαν θεων τε και ανθρωπων . To which we may add, as a companion, Dr. Jortin's portrait of Achilles: "A boifterous, rapacious, mercenary, "cruel, and unrelenting brute; and the reader pities none of his calamities, and is pleased with none of his successes!" This is far enough from the παραδειγμα επιεικιας. But for a juster account of this matter, and for the best illustration of this passage of Aristotle that can be given, I refer the reader to Dr. Beattie's analysis of the character of this hero, as drawn by Homer; Essay on Poetry, &c. Part I. ch. iv.

^{2 &}quot;So that he united in himself two vices the most opposite to each other; ava-"ricious meanness on the one hand, and, on the other, an insolent contempt both of "Gods and men."—P. 174, ed. Massey.

⁵ Six Differtations, p. 214.

N O T E 120.

P. 95. And besides these, whatever relates to those senses which have a necessary connection with Poetry.

The fenses that belong to, accompany, or are connected with, Poetry, are, plainly, the sight, and the hearing, as relative to the Οψις, or spectacle, in the whole extent of that term, and to the Μελοποιία or Music. When these are said to be έξ ἀναγκης ἀνολεθεσαι τη ποιητική, it cannot be meant that the parts relative to them are essential to the Tragic Poem, like the fable, manners, &c. but only, that they are necessary appendages of the drama in its complete state, as designed for representation. This is perfectly conformable to what was before said of the Οψις; that, though confessedly, in one view, ήκισα δικείον της ποιητικής. , yet, in another view, ΕΞ ΑΝΑΓΚΗΣ ἀν είη τι μορίον της Τραγωδίας ὁ της Οψεως κοσμω.

The drift of the precept is obvious. The decoration should be such as to agree with the rules just laid down for the manners.

^{*} In the treatife Πεςι ἀισθησεως, the fame expression occurs:—ἡ μεν ἀφη και γευσις ΑΚΟΛΟΥΘΓΙ πασιν ΕΞ ΑΝΑΓΚΗΣ. " Tasus et gustus animalia omnia necessario comitantur." Tom. i. f. 6-3. ed. Daval.

a Cap. vi. - " is myl foreign to the art." - Transl. Part II. Scot. 3.

b Icid. init. "The DECORATION must necessarily be one of its parts." Part II. Scot. 2.

The scenery, dresses, action, &c. must be apportiona, opoix—probability, nature, and the cossume, must be observed. Even the puping beation be improved imitation, has here, too, its obvious application. The squalid hair, and ragged dress, of Electra, must, as well as the sudgeous of Achilles, be a little slattered in the representation, and not too like, &c.

The rule extends, also, to the Melopæia, or the Mufic; which, from other passages of Aristotle's works, we may suspect to have been sometimes such, as sacrificed propriety, and just expression—the $\eta\theta\eta$, the $\pi\varrho\epsilon\pi\sigma\nu$, &c. to the depraved taste of what he calls the $\varphi\varrho\varrho\tau m\omega$ spectators⁴.

It is probable that Aristotle alludes, also, to cap. xvii. and to the mistakes, which the Poet is liable to commit, who composes without keeping the stage, and the effects of representation, in his eye.

Though the Poet neither painted the scenes, nor made the dresses, yet all this formed one of the fix constituent parts of Tragedy; fell, of course, under the direction and control of the Poet, and was of the utmost importance to the success of his piece, at a time when representation was almost essential to the idea of dramatic poetry⁴.

Σπεψαι με ΠΙΝΑΡΑΝ ΚΟΜΑΝ,
 Και ΤΡΥΧΗ ΤΑΔ΄ έμων πεπλων.

Eurip. Elestra, 184.

* See, De Repub. lib. viii. cap. 6, and 7, p. 457, E. 459, A. ed. Duval. The contests (ἀγωνες), indeed, of which he speaks in these passages, seem to have been merely musical. But the known influence of the same popular audience in the dramatic contests, and the caution given by Aristotle in the passage we are considering, make it probable, that even in the music of Tragedy, especially in the instrumental part of it, something of the same accommodation might prevail.

- ° Transl. Part II. Sect. 17.
- d See Diff. I. Part II, at the end.

N O T E 121.

P. 96. ALL THOSE DISCOVERIES IN WHICH THE SIGN IS PRODUCED BY WAY OF PROOF.

'At TISEWS EVERA. Well explained by Dacier after the Italian commentators. Indeed, the very words of Homer, in the passage alluded to, sufficiently illustrate the meaning of the expression.

Ει δ'αγε δη και ΣΗΜΑ ἀριφραδες άλλο τι δειξω, 'Οφρα με ἐυ γνωτον, ΠΙΣΤΩΘΗΤΟΝ τ' ἐνι θυμω, 'ΟΥΛΗΝ————, &c. Od. φ. 217.

"To give you firmer faith, now trust your eye:

"Lo! the broad fear indented on my thigh."

Pope, xxi. 226.

Other instances of figns thus used, not for the purpose of accidental discovery, but as confirmations of a voluntary discovery previously made, may easily be found. Thus, in the Electra of Sophocles, when Electra asks her brother, 'H yas ou results;—he answers—

Τηνδε προσβλεψασ' έμε
 Σφραγιδα πατρ©, έκμαθ' έι σαφη λεγω.

N O T E 122.

P. 96. Those which----happen suddenly and casually, are better.

Εκ περιπετειας.—" Non valet hic περιπετεια, mutationem illam "ingentem fortunarum, sed, εκ περιπετειας, significat, casu, fortuito, et quia ita cecidit."—Victorius.

So in the passage from Polybius quoted by Suidas, under the words Περιπετεια, and Ευμενης:—ἐ τυχη το πλειον συνεργώ χρωμεν , ἐδ ΕΚ ΠΕΡΙΠΕΤΕΙΑΣ, ἀλλα δια της ἀγχινοιας. κ. τ. λ.

Aristotle's using the word thus, adverbially, after having hitherto used it only in its technical, or dramatic, sense, of a sudden change of fortune, produces some ambiguity; and the more so, as the adverbial phrase, in the action to be of very common occurrence. Heinflus, taking resumeres in the dramatic sense, translates—" quæ e mutationibus in contrarium orientur;" which, indeed, is the obvious meaning of the expression, if not understood adverbially. But it cannot be Aristotle's meaning, because the discovery of the scar of Ulysses was not the consequence of any such resumeres. Indeed, it was neither the consequence, nor the cause, of any reverse of fortune.

I have fometimes suspected that Aristotle might write it, in $\Pi PO\Pi ETEIA\Sigma$, by which all ambiguity would have been avoided. But, perhaps, after all, the phrase had no ambiguity to Greek ears, and the passage may be right as it stands.

N O T E 123.

P. 96. DISCOVERIES INVENTED, AT PLEASURE, BY THE POET, AND, ON THAT ACCOUNT, STILL INARTIFICIAL.

Δευτεραι δε, αι πεποιημεναι ύπο τε ποιητε, διο ατεχνοι.—The expreffion, πεποιημεναι ύπο τε ποιητε, must necessarily, I think, be underflood emphatically, and must mean, not merely invented, (for so are the other discoveries also, which follow,) but arbitrarily invented by the Poet, and obviously so, " upon the spur of the occasion;" in opposition to such means of discovery and recognition, as, though still indeed of the Poet's invention, are artfully prepared in the very texture of his plot, and appear to arise, necessarily or probably, bably, from the action itself. And thus I find it well explained by Piccolomini: - " Chiama Aristotele questa seconda spetie " di riconoscimento, fatto dal Poeta: e così lo chiama, non " perche in tutte le spetie il Poeta non sia quello che li riconoscimenti, " ficcome le altre parti dell' attione e della favola ponga e formi " coi verli susi; ma ha dato à questa spetie più ch' all' altre questo " nome, perche in essa, non fondandosi il Poeta, nè nello stesso " connettimento delle cose, e nella stessa favola, nè in segno al-" cuno che la persona stessa, che s'ha da riconoscere, gli offerisca "inanzi; egli, per questo, come libero divenuto, à fuo mero (quali) " arvitrio, reca, finge, e pone in bocca della persona à voglia sua, " quella occasione di riconoscimento che più gli piace," &c. [p. 230.] -Yet, as this fense is rather inferred from the explanation subjoined, (ταυτα εν αυτω λεγει 'A ΒΟΥΛΕΤΑΙ 'Ο ΠΟΙΗΤΗΣ, αλλ εχ δ MY Θ O Σ) than expressed by the words themselves, I am much inclined to suppose some omission in the text.

The other reading, OTK arexpos, is very plausibly supported by the Abbe Batteux, from a passage of Aristotle's Rhetoric, which has been already mentioned in NOTE 104°. I doubt, however, whether that passage be fairly applicable to this b. But though it were, the sense above given, and which I think must be given, to the expression memory one to the expression memory one to the Aristotle with this reading. For can we conceive that Aristotle would assign as a reason why such discoveries are not inartificial, that they are artistravily (and therefore easily,) invented by the Poet?—ΔIO & 220

I must observe, however, that though these two readings are diametrically opposite,—ἀτεχνοι—ἐκ ἀτεχνοι—yet, it is some comfort, that whichever we adopt, the general sense of the passage a Rhet. I. c. ii. Των δε πισεων, ώι μεν άτεχνη λου-κ. τ. λ.

b In that passage, ATTMIA, is opposed to ENTEXNA, and means, such things as are foreign to the orator's art.—Here, the word means, not foreign to the Poet's art, but only—requiring little, or no art, or ingenuity of invention, in the Poet.

will be the same. As such discoveries are of the Poet's invention, they are not arexvoi, in the rhetorical sense: as they require very little invention, compared with those which arise from the action itself, they may, in this view, be denominated, arexvoi. In either reading, therefore, Aristotle will be found to say the same thing; i. e. that the discoveries of this second species are, in point of art and ingenuity, superior to the first species, and inferior to all the rest.

N O T E 124.

P. 96. ORESTES, AFTER HAVING DISCOVERED HIS SISTER, DISCOVERS HIMSELF TO HER.

The Greek is— $\alpha v = \gamma v \omega \rho i \sigma \epsilon$ $\tau \eta v \alpha \delta \epsilon \lambda \rho \eta v$, $\alpha v = \gamma v \omega \rho i \sigma \theta \epsilon i \varsigma$ $\delta v = \delta v = \delta v + \delta v = \delta$ this, as Victorius has observed, seems to say the reverse; i. e. that Orestes discovered his fifter after having been discovered by her: which is not the fact. One would rather have expected—avayνωρισας την αδελφην, ανεγνωρισθη ύπ' έκειτης: which would also have been clearer, and not have given occasion to the commentators to fuppose, that the discovery of Iphigenia by the letter was meant to be included in this fecond and faulty species of discovery; whereas the expression OION Oe. ΑΝΕΓΝΩΡΙΣΕ την άθελρην, leads very naturally to that idea. But it is easy to see, upon the least reflection, that the discovery of Orestes only is the example here intended. is fufficiently explained by Dacier after Victorius. It was natural enough, however, for Aristotle to mention the other discovery, in passing, as being the counterpart of a double duays agon; in the same drama. [See cap. xi. at the end. Transl. Part II. Sect. 9.]—But this whole passage, I may say, this whole chapter, has undoubtedly been most miserably mangled in transcription.

N O T E 125.

P. 96. But Orestes, by [verbal proofs] &c.

The reading which Victorius regarded as most authentic is this: - εκευ 🕏 δε * * * * * * ταυτα εν αυτ 🗈 λεγει ά βυλεται δ ποιητης, αλλ' εχ ε μυθ. - But four Medicean manuscripts, and, it feems, all those in the King of France's library, agree in readingin the latter, we are told, the words are written without any biatus. This last reading, however, appears to me short and deficient. I cannot but think that the author, after the words exen & de,—had expressed the means of the discovery, and by them denominated this species, as he has all the others: $-\delta i\alpha \sigma \eta \mu \epsilon i\omega \nu - \delta i\alpha \mu \nu \eta \mu \eta \epsilon - \epsilon \nu \sigma \nu \lambda \delta \sigma \gamma i \sigma \mu \epsilon - . But how the$ vacancy was filled, it is impossible to determine; and it is of the less consequence to determine, as we are in possession of the Tragedy itself. Δια σημειων, which Victorius found in one MS. or, δια τεκμηριών, as Dacier ingeniously conjectured from the words of Euripides himself, seem most probable. In point of meaning, it is indifferent by which of these appellations these discoveries were diffinguished; τεκμηριον being, according to Aristotle's own definition in his Rhetoric, only a species of σημείον. Τετων δε (i. e. των σημείων,) το μεν αναγκαίον, τεκμηρίον b . Σημείον is a fign, or token: Temmpion, a certain, decifive fign, fuch as puts an end to all doubt, according to the derivation of the word given by Aristotle in the passage just referred to. We see, therefore, with what strict propriety the word is used by Euripides, when Iphigenia demands, and Orestes professes to give, a decisive proof:

² See edit. Ox. 1780, and Batteux's translation, note 3.—But M. Batteux is mistaken in faying that Victorius omits the words ταυτα εν:—he gives them in his text, and translates them in his commentary. He rejects only the supplement, δια σημειών.

b Lil. i. cap. ii. p. 517. ed. Duval.

Iphig.—έχεις τι τωνδε μοι ΤΕΚΜΗΡΙΟΝ;

And Orestes, presently after, when he produces his last and strongest proof, says——

'Αδ' ειδον αυτ©, ταδε φρασω ΤΕΚΜΗΡΙΑ '

It is, indeed, some objection to δια σημειων, in this passage of Aristotle, that it would appear to confound this discovery with the first, by giving it the same denomination. But this, perhaps, would be sufficiently obviated by the explanation immediately subjoined:—δια σημειων ΤΑΥΤΑ μεν εν ἀυτ. ΛΕΓΕΙ ὰ βελεται, &c. Σημειον, in the first species of discovery, is used for visible, external proofs: here, it would be used for verbal, argumentative proofs; as it is used, continually, in this treatise. And it may also be observed, that Aristotle himself, at the end of this chapter, (if the integrity of the text be admitted,) refers to this fort of discovery, among others, under the denomination of πεποιημενα ΣΗΜΕΙΑ.

N O T E 126.

P. 96. For some of the things, from which those proofs are drawn, are even such as might have been produced as visible signs.

—Εξην γας αν ενια και ενεγκειν.—In the fense which I have given to this obscure sentence, the only sense that I thought could fairly be extracted from the words, I am glad to find myself supported by the judgment of Victorius.—" Quare propè dictum peccatum est: (δί " ὁ ἐγγυς της ἐιζημειης ἀμαςτιας ἐςιν.) quia si illa quibus usus est Orestes " non omninò signa fuerunt;—neque enim ostendi potuerunt;— " propè tamen illa accesserunt; atque ita propè ut quædam ex " ipsis illius prosus generis fuerint, quamvis ita ipsis ille usus non [•] Iphig. in Taur.—from v. 808—to 826.—In the Electra of Sophocles, ΣΑΦΗ ΣΗΜΕΙΑ is used, v. 892, as equivalent to τεμμηρίου which occurs afterwards, v. 910.

"fit. Hoc enim arbitror valere, "licebat enim quædam etiam por-"tare"—id est, manu tenere, et jubere ut ipsa videret ac reminif-"ceretur," &c.

Evia, because all the proofs of Orestes were not of this kind, but only Electra's work, and the lance.

N O T E 127.

P. 96. THE DISCOVERY BY THE SOUND OF THE SHUTTLE.

H THE REQUISES QUEEN—Dacier, after some other commentators, makes a speaking shuttle of this; and wonders, as, indeed, he well might, that the great critic should let so monstrous an absurdity pass without a severer censure than that of its wanting art. Others understand, much more reasonably, not the literal, but the metaphorical, voice of the shuttle, in the epistolary web by which Philomela is said to have conveyed to her sister the dismal tale of her sufferings, —ίς ε ποικιλμασι ΣΤΟΜΑΤΙ χρησαμενη, in the language of that most curious of all Poets, John Ttetzes".

But as this feems to have been the current traditional story, I do not fee how it could be adduced as a circumstance invented at pleafure by the Poet. I should rather suppose, that the discovery in question, whatever it might be, was effected by the found of the shuttle, which Aristotle calls, $\varphi_{\omega\nu\eta}$, voice, not, probably, in his own language, but in the poetical language of the Tragedy itself to which he alludes. For these requides, it seems, were a very vocal fort of things, nothing like the shuttles of "these degenerate" days." Every one recollects the "arguto pestine" of Virgil. But this is nothing to the amplification of some Greek epigrammatists, who scruple not to compare them to swallows, and even to nightingales;

² Chil. vii. 142.—See Ovid's Metam. lib. wi. 572, &c.

Κερκιδας δρθρολαλοισι ΧΕΛΙΔΟΣΙΝ εικελοφωνες-

And, Κερκιδα δ' ευποιητον ΑΗΔΟΝΛ--- .

Hence the ridiculous fancy of Joseph Scaliger, that the metamorphosis of Procne into a swallow was exhibited in the Tereus of Sophocles, and that a shuttle was made use of, instead of a whistle or bird-pipe, to imitate the swallow's voice!——

N O T E 128.

P. 96. Thus in the Cyprians of Dicæogenes -----

That this was a distinct Poem from the $Ku\pi\rho\iota\alpha$ mentioned afterwards in cap. xxiii. seems clear from this single circumstance, observed by Victorius, that the Epic Poem called The Cypriaes,— $\tau\alpha$ $Ku\pi\rho\iota\alpha$ $\dot{\epsilon}\pi\eta$,—is mentioned there by Aristotle, as it is, generally, by other antient writers, in terms that imply a doubt of its author $\dot{\epsilon}$: whereas here the author is named, without any expression of uncertainty.

Whether the Poem was Epic, or Tragic, cannot be determined; nor, from the ambiguity of the case, τois $Ku\pi \varrho iois$, whether the title of it was $T\alpha$ $Ku\pi \varrho i\alpha$, or, Oi $Ku\pi \varrho ioi$ —The Cypriacs, or, The Cyprians. The latter is, certainly, the most probable title for a Tragedy, and therefore, as Dicæogenes is recorded only as a Tragic and Dithyrambic Poet, I have ventured to adopt it.

b Anthol. lib. vi. cap. 8.

^{· —} ὁ τα Κυπριακα ποιησας——.

N O T E - 129.

P. 96. IN THE TALE OF ALCINOUS.

See Od. VIII. 521.—There is another discovery of the same kind in the 4th book, where Menelaus recognizes Telemachus by the tears he sheds at the mention of his father. There is not, I think, either in Homer, or in any other Poet, a more natural and affecting picture of friendly regret on the one hand, and filial affection on the other.—"Of all the friends I have lost," says Menelaus, addressing himself to Telemachus without knowing who he was—" one there is, whom I lament more than all "the rest:"——

Τηλεμαχ θ θ, ον έλειπε νεου γεγαωτ' ένι δίπω.

Ως φατο τω δ' άρα πατς ύφ' ίμερον ώρσε γουυ. Δακου δ' άπο βλεφαραν χαμαδις βαλε, πατς άκεσας, Χλαιναν πορφυρεην άντ' όφθαλμοιίν άνασχων Αμφοτερησι χερσι' νοησε δε μιν Μενελα.

Od. A. 105-2.

That the title, Λλεινου, or Αλεινυ, εἰπολογ, was understood to refer chiefly to the long narration of Ulysses, which occupies sour books of the Odyssey, seems clear, even from the proverbial application of the expression. Απολογ Δλαμου. - επι των φλυαοεντων, και μακιρον αποτεινουτων λογον.—Suidas. And fo Jul. Pollux: -έπι μαπρων ρησεων. But a passage in Aristotle's Rhetoric leaves no doubt. He there expressly mentions Homer's account of the fpeech of Ulysses to Penelope, Od. xxiii. 310, &c. as being the Adams απολογ compressed into an abridgment of thirty verses.— Παραδειγμα ο Αλκινε απολογω, ότι προς την Πηνελοπην εν τριακοντα έπετι πεποιηται. Now those verses are, in fact, a mere table of contents to the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th books, which contain the narrative of Ulysses at the court of Alcinous.—This title, therefore, (Arews Areloy®) must at least have extended to those four books. But the passage which is the subject of this note, seems to prove that it extended still farther; for here we are referred to the cighth book under that title; though the speech, the manea inoi; of Ulysses, does not commence till the ninth. The editions prefix the title, Αλκινε ἀπολοΓΟΙ, only to the eighth book.—The fact feems to be, that the titles, by which the different parts of Homer's Poems were first distinguished, were applied to parts of very unequal lengths; fo that afterwards, when the equal, or nearly equal. division into books took place, it would not always coincide exactly with the other division, formed by the different distinct subjects or episodes of the Poem; but one title would sometimes comprehend feveral books, and different parts of the fame book, would fometimes be diffinguished by different titles. Thus, for example, the fifth book of the Odyssey had two titles, Kahubes Αυτρον, and Σχεδια, or Τα περι την σχεδιαν: and the last book three, Νεκυιαν-Τα εν Λαερτε-and, Σποιδαι . And thus, on the other hand, the title, Adense Attodogo, is not, I apprehend, to be confidered as appropriated to any one book, but, probably, comprehended five books—from the eighth to the twelfth, inclusively;

^{*} Not ill translated by Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, book iv. 131.

b II. 4. and VI. 26.

[·] III. 16. p. 603. ed. Duval.

^{*} See Ælian V. High lib. xiii. co. 14, and the notes of Perizonius.

perhaps, was understood to refer, generally, to the whole Epifode of Alcinous; as indeed the expression AAKINOY ἀπολογω—" the "fory of Alcinous"—feems rather to imply. And the different parts of this long Episode were, again, subdistinguished by other titles; fuch as, Κυπλωπια, Νεκυια, Τα Κιρκης, &c. Indeed, the title, Αλκινε Απολογοι, though prefixed only to the eighth book, feems evidently extended beyond that book by the title fubjoined as its equivalent,—'Η, τα τε Οδυσσεως παρα Αλκινω. But how the word ἀπολογ@ got into the plural number here, I do not well understand. This circumstance, however, together with the idea of its being confined to this fingle book, has, I think, led Perizonius and other learned men into mistakes concerning the reason of the appellation. Perizonius (ubi fup.) thinks the eighth book was so called, " because there are several speeches of Alcinous in it;" and others suppose, that the title alludes to the songs of Demodocus.

N O T E 130.

P. 96. THE DISCOVERY OCCASIONED BY REASONING, OR INFERENCE; SUCH AS THAT IN THE CHOEPHORÆ—.

Here is much obscurity and confusion.—One thing, however, seems clear; that ἐπ συλλογισμε, cannot mean as some interpreters have understood it to mean, "by reasoning or inference in the "mind of the person who makes the discovery;" because this is common to all the modes of discovery. When Electra recognizes her brother, does she not infer, or, in the philosopher's language, syllogize? "This man has seen the lance—nobody could see it "but Orestes—This is Orestes."—And the same may be said of all the other recognitions. Discovery by inference, therefore, on the part of the discoverer, cannot be made a diffinit species. The discovery Aristotle means, is plainly a discovery, not made, but occasioned, by inference. Throughout all his instances, he considers only the means, or occasion, of discovery, as surnished, in some way or other, by the person discovered. With respect to bodily marks, bracelets, &c. the letter of Iphigenia, and the verbal renungia of Orestes, this is obvious enough. But the case is the same with the discovery by memory: in both the examples of that species, the persons are discovered, not by recollection in the discoverers, but by the effects of it in themselves. And so here too, in the three last examples of discovery in such and so here too, in the three last examples of discovery in such and so here too, in the persons are discovered by their own reasoning, or inference; that is, by something which it leads them to say.

^{*} Schmidius, in Pind. Nem. p. 34.

But, the difficulty is, that Aristotle's first example, appears not to accord with this idea, and with the other examples. The inference here, appears to be, even from the words themselves, and, if the Choëphoræ of Æschylus be intended, as the commentators suppose, certainly is,—inference in the mind of the person who makes the discovery. But as this, for the reasons already given, cannot, I think, be admitted, we must either leave this knot as it is, or solve it by supposing some other Tragedy, not extant, to be meant, in which the conclusion mentioned was, as in all the other instances that follow, the occasion only of the discovery. Nor will this appear a very improbable supposition, if we recollect the ² Some time after these remarks were written, I sound them coincide exactly with those of Piccolomini, whose comment on this passage is, as usual, exact and clear. See also Benius, who follows him.

Τεταςτη δε, η εκ συλλογισμα· όιου, εν Χοηφοςοις, [al. Χλοηφοςοις] ότι, όμοι τις έληλυθεν· όμοι δε άθεις ἀλλ' η Ορεκης· όυτ άρα έληλυθεν.

So, Beni: "Itaque primum exemplum sic intelligendum crediderim, ut Elestra agnita sit, non Orestes: ita, nimirum, ut cum Orestes co modo ratiocinantem audiret puellam, dum Orestem sibi similem diceret, inde Elestram agnoscat." Pauli Benii, in Ar. Poet. Comment. p. 348.

fwarm of Tragic Poets who were continually exercifing their invention upon a few popular subjects, and the number of different Tragedies which, in consequence, we find recorded, not only on the same subject, but even with the same title; often with some slight variation only, in the mode of a discovery, and other episodic incidents of the plot, which would still leave a general resemblance, a fort of samily likeness, between them, such as, in fact, we find in Tragedies on the same subject now extant; in the Electra of Sophocles, and that of Euripides, and the Choëphoræ of Eschylus.

But we may fay, farther, that this supposition seems to be favoured by the Tragedy of Æschylus, itself; with which, what Aristotle here fays, appears to me by no means exactly to correspond. The reader, who will take the trouble to examine the whole passage supposed to be here alluded to, from v. 166, to v. 2330, will, I believe, think with me, that the discovery, in that play, cannot with propriety be denominated a difcovery made by inference from refemblance. The circumstances of the lock of hair, and the footsteps, produce in Electra's mind no more than a glimmering of hope—σαινομαι δ'ύτ' έλπιδω [v. 192.]—and she is so far from difeovering Orestes by them, that even when he appears before her, the is not convinced till he produces the δρασμα—the veft, or veil. This is justly remarked by Brumoy; "Tout cela " (i. e. the hair, &c.) ne fait que la rendre plus inquiete: Elle de-" meure donc dans ce trouble jusqu' à ce qu' Oreste paroisse à ses " yeux. Il se montre tout à coup, et se fait reconnoitre pour son " frere, en lui présentant un voile qu'elle a tissu elle-meme"." This I take to be the true avayvagious of this drama; and it belongs rather to Aristotle's first class— δια σημειών; if not even to the worst fort of that class, where the sign is produced πιζεως ένεια,—by way of proof. Indeed, even admitting that Electra may be considered as recognizing her brother by inference from the resemblance of the lock of hair and the sootsteps only, still, as Piccolomini acutely and solidly observes, this instance would belong to the first species of discovery by signs. "Questo riconoscimento non è della quarta "specie, ma della prima; nato, non da sillogismo, ma da segno: posticache Elettra, preso per segno d'Oreste la capigliatura, sopra tal segno, quasi sopra mezzo termine, sabrica il sillogismo che ella sa "in se stessa, argomentando, che colui susse Oreste: havendo io già detto, ch' in ogni riconoscimento suol' intervenir sillogismo ed "argomentatione dentro all'animo della persona riconoscente." p. 236.

^{*} In Mr. Potter's Æschylus, from p. 329, to 334. Quarto.

[&]quot;Theat, des Grees, ii. p. b.—Mr. Potter is of the same opinion:—"No discovery is from bence raised: but the mind of Electra is deeply struck; she reasons and conjectures, and so is finely trepared for the discovery which soon follows." Notes on the Chalphorie.

N O T E 131.

P. 97. "HE CAME TO FIND HIS SON, AND HE HIMSELF" "MUST PERISH."

It is not very obvious, how these words are to be brought to any thing like reasoning, or inference.—But all here is darkness. The far-fetched explanation which Dacier has condescended to borrow, without notice, from Castelvetro, for whom, in his preface, he expresses so much contempt, only serves to make the "dark—"ness" more "visible."

I know not whether it be worth while to remark a mere resemblance of expression, but a very close one, in Homer:

Μη πατες' αντιθέου ΔΙΖΗΜΕΝΟΣ, ΑΥΤΟΣ 'ΟΛΩΜΑΙ. Od. O. 90.

N O T E 132.

P. 97. THERE IS ALSO A COMPOUND SORT, &c.

When the meaning of an author cannot be fatisfactorily explained, all that a translator can do, is, to be particularly careful to render faithfully his words. This I have endeavoured to do here: but whether I have done even this, the manifest corruption of the text must leave uncertain. Whatever sense may be enveloped in the Greek, I hope remains enveloped in the English. what that is, I will not undertake to fay. - With respect to the title of the drama, Οδυσσευς Ψευδαγγελ©, if I have not given it its only pollible fense, I have, furely, given it its most natural and obvious sense: - Ulysses in the disguise of a messenger. For I am really not able to fee, how the words, without violent twifting, can be made to fignify paffively, as Castelvetro would have it, "Ulisse di cui sono recate false novelle;" though Victorius has pronounced a man to be a fool, who pretends to determine which of these two meanings is the right one *. Had a false Ulysses been meant, it seems probable, that the word Yeuloουσσευς would rather have been used; as Ψευδηγακλης, The false Hercules, was the title of a Comedy of Menander.

Aναγνως. εντ . τε θεατςε: I fee no other construction, as the text stands. And so Victorius:—" Spectatores ita accepisse illam "vocem, tanquam si ipsi, rei illius auxilio, ipsum agnituri essent."

Ulysses seems to have been a rich and valuable resource to the dramatic writers. His history surnished the subjects of many Comedies, as well as Tragedies. See Casaubon upon Athenaus, p. 297.—There were, Ulysses Wounded—Ulysses Mad—Ulysses the Deserter—Ulysses Ship wrecked—Ulysses Weaving, &c.—The subject of the play here mentioned feems to have been suggested by Homer, Od. Ξ . 120. But, what it was—how this discovery was compound (surber)—or how, indeed, it was a discovery at all—what the precise paralogism was, &c. I confess myself totally unable, from the short, perplexed, and probably corrupt words of the text, to make out. The reader may see, however, a great variety of disferent conjectures in the commentators; and I believe when he has read them all he will find himself just where he was. For my part, I leave this bow of Ulysses to be bent by stronger arms than mine:——

^{2 &}quot;Hec enim ita incerta funt, ut flultum esse videatur aliquid ipsorum affirmare."

Ω φιλοι, ε μεν έγω τανυω -λαβετω δε και άλλ...

N O T E 133.

P. 97. BUT OF ALL DISCOVERIES, THE BEST IS THAT WHICH ARISES FROM THE ACTION ITSELF——.

I agree with those commentators, who understand this to be given by Aristotle as a species of avayvagious distinct from any of the preceding. This appears, I. From his examples, which are very different from all those before produced, and not reducible, I think, to any of his classes. The discovery of Iphigenia by the letter, is, indeed, mentioned under his second class, but not as an instance of that species.—See NOTE 124. 2dly, and principally, from his saying, "After these, the next best are the discoveries "by inference"—naming an entire species; which he would not, surely, have done, had his best of all discoveries been such, as might be found equally in the other species; had he been speaking, as some understand him, only of the best way of using the discoveries already enumerated.

N O T E 134.

P. 98. Such discoveries are the Best, Because they alone are effected without invented proofs, or bracelets, &c. Next to these are the discoveries by inference.

If the words, πεποιημενων σημειων, refer, as it is generally underflood, to the fecond fort of discoveries exclusively, it is not easy to see how it can be true, that the fifth and best fort of discoveries, that επ πρωγματων, is the only one that is effected without invented figns, bracelets, &c.—for, on this supposition, the same may evidently be said of the third and fourth classes, those by memory, and by inference, which are expressly distinguished from the two sirst classes.

Any incident, or fingle action, of that combination of actions that compose a fable, is faid, I think, to be if auton πραγματων, when it is prepared in the texture of the plot, and appears to follow so naturally and of course (κατα το ἀναγκαιον ἢ το ἐικω—) from the incidents which precede it, that the spectator does not see how it could have been otherwise. On the contrary, those incidents are

² What is here expressed by, ἐξ ἀυτων πραγματων, is more fully expressed, cap. x. where are not it auran πραγματων, which are not thus gradually prepared, but have, more or lefs, the appearance of expedients brought in to answer the purpose of the moment; which suggest the idea of occasional and easy contrivance; which, though not, perhaps, improbable, yet have not such a degree of probability, as answers fully the purpose of dramatic illusion, by acting upon the mind of the spectator as necessity, and keeping his attention rivetted to the action, without suffering him, as it were, to turn his eyes a moment from it, to the resources of the Poet's invention.

Now the third and fourth forts of discovery appear, when we examine them, to be of this kind. They are not prepared and brought on gradually by the previous circumftances of the fable, as in the examples given from the Occipus, and Iphigenia in Tauris, but effected by contrivances, more or lefs naturally introduced by the Poet, at the moment when they are wanted; by tears suddenly shed at the fight of a picture, by an exclamation suddenly uttered. These, therefore, are not improperly included under the denomination of $\pi \in \pi \circ i\eta \mu \in \nu \alpha$ ($\tilde{\nu} \pi \circ \tau \circ \pi \circ i\eta \tau \circ \circ$); and they are, also, in the proper and logical fense of the word, σημαα; the tears, in the one case, and the illative reflection, or exclamation, in the other, being figns or tokens, by which the persons are recognized. And thus, what Aristotle here says seems true—that the discovery which arises out of the action itself, is the only fort that is entirely effected ανευ των πεποιημενων σημειων και περιδεραιων: by περιδεραια, meaning the first class of discoveries, and under $\pi \varepsilon \pi$. $\sigma \eta \mu$. comprehending the three other classes.

where he fays of the discovery and revolution, that they should arise έξ ἀντής της συσασεως τε μυθε· ώσε ΕΚ ΤΩΝ ΠΡΟΓΕΓΕΝΗΜΕΝΩΝ συμβαινείν, ἡ έξ ἀναγαις ἡ κατα το ἐίκ, γιγνεσθαι ταυτα. Transs. Part II. Sect. 8.

b "Puisque la fonction du vraisemblable dans la Tragedie, est d'empecher de s'appercevoir de la feinte, le vraisemblable qui trompe le mieux est le plus parsait, et c'est celui qui devient necessaire." Fontenelle, Rest. sur la Poetique, Sect. 63.

He has, plainly, arranged his modes of discovery, as he had before arranged the modes of managing the maly, or difastrous incidents, of Tragedy (cap. xiv.)—in the order of their comparative excellence; beginning with the worft, and proceeding gradually to the best. When he tells us, that the discoveries by inference are the next best, he evidently considers them, as not being, strictly at least, έξ αυτων πραγματων; and so far, I think, is intelligible: but, in what respect they are better than the preceding species, dia programs, he has not told us. The discovery by recollection may, perhaps, in this respect be regarded as hefs έξ αυτων πραγματων, or, more of the "Poet's making," as it feems to require the introduction of fomething accidental and extraneous, fuch as the picture in his first instance, and the Bard and his performance, in the fecond; circumstances, which have more the appearance of expedients than the reflection of Orestes, for example, in the Tragedy of Polyides. For that reflection arose, at least, naturally, and folcly, from his situation, and that situation was essential to the fable.—But it is time to release the reader, and myself, from the embarrassiments of one of the most corrupt, confused, and ambiguous chapters of this mutilated and disfigured work.

N O T E 135.

P. 98. This, the Poet, &c.

'Ο μη ὁρωντα τον θεατην ἐλανθανεν. Dacier has, at least, I think, satisfactorily proved, that this passage wants some emendation, and that the sense must be—" escaped the Poet, (not the spectator,) "for want of his seeing, or conceiving himself to see, the action." He might have added to his other reasons, that the word λανθανοιτο, applied just before to the Poet, seems to six the same application of ελανθανε here. The opposition, as he has observed, is strongly marked:—it escaped the Poet; επι ΔΕ της ΣΚΗΝΗΣ, &c.

but upon the flage, &c. Castelvetro had seen this before Dacier, and conjectured, $\delta \mu \eta$, $\delta \rho \omega \nu \tau \alpha$, $\Omega \Sigma \tau \sigma \nu \theta \epsilon \alpha \tau \eta \nu$, $\delta \lambda \alpha \nu \theta \alpha \nu \epsilon \nu \lambda \Delta \nu$ " La " qual contrarietà non sarebbe potuto essere celata a Carcino, se " avesse riguardata la sua Tragedia non come Poeta, ma come vedi- " tore "." The ingenuity of the conjecture may be allowed; not so, I fear, the accuracy of the Greek.

N O T E 136.

P. 98. IN COMPOSING, THE POET SHOULD ALSO, AS MUCH AS POSSIBLE, BE AN ACTOR.

—Τοις σχημασι συναπεργαζομενον ποιειν.—The fame expression occurs in the Rhetoric III. 8.—αναγιη τες συναπεργαζομενες σχημασι, και φωναις, και εσθητι, και όλως τη υποκρισει, ελεεινοτερες είναι. But there, this is mentioned only as the means, by which the Orator may excite greater emotion in the hearer, immediately: here, as the means, by which the Poet may excite a stronger emotion, a greater reality of imagination and feeling, and a more perfect alienation of person, if I may venture so to call it, in bimself, immediately; in order to produce afterwards a correspondent effect upon the spectator, by the sorce and truth of his imitation.

"I have often observed," says the admirable author of the Inquiry concerning the Sublime and Beautiful, "that on minicking the looks and gestures of angry, or placid, or frighted, or daring men, I have involuntarily sound my mind turned to that passion whose appearance I endeavoured to imitate; nay, I am convinced it is hard to avoid it, though one strove to separate the passion from its correspondent gestures." I believe, however, it is hardly possible to put on the bodily appearance of any passion,

² P. 371.

b Part IV. Sect. IV.—See also the curious account there given of Campanella.

without previously turning the mind, in some degree, to that passion. But it is certain, that the effect, in this case, will react upon the cause, and convert a slight and nascent emotion into a more steady, strong, and real seeling of the passion.

A singular instance of the practice of this rule of Aristotle—σχημασι συναπεραζομενον ποιεν—in a sister art, is given in the following curious account, from Felibien, of Domenichino, a painter remarkable for expression.

"Il ne pouvoit comprendre qu'il y eut des peintres qui travail-" lassent à des ouvrages considérables avec si peu d'application, " que pendant leur travail ils ne laissassent pas de s'entretenir avec " leurs amis. Il les regardoit comme des ouvriers qui n'avoient " que la pratique, et nulle intelligence de l'art; etant perfuadé " qu'un Peintre, pour bien réussir, doit entrer dans une parfaite "connoissance des affections de l'esprit et des passions de l'ame; " qu'il doit les sentir en lui même, et s'il faut ainsi dire, faire les " memes actions et souffrir les mêmes mouvemens qu'il veut repré-" senter: ce qui ne se peut au milieu des distractions. Aussi on "l'entendoit quelquefois parler en travaillant, avec une voix lan-" guissante et pleine de douleur, ou tenir des discours agréables et " joyeux, felon les divers fentimens qu'il avoit intention d'expri-"mer. Mais pour cela, il s'enfermoit dans un lieu sort retiré, " pour n'être pas apperçu dans ces differens états, ni par ses eléves, " ni par ceux de sa famille; parcequ'il lui étoit arrivé quelquesois, " que des gens qui l'avoient vû dans ces transports, l'avoient soup-" çonné de folie. Lorsque dans sa jeunesse il travailloit au Tableau " du Martyre de S. André qui est à S. Gregoire, Annibal Carrache "étant allé pour le voir, il le furprit comme il étoit dans une action " de colère et menaçante. Après l'avoir observé quelque temps, il " connut qu'il representoit un soldat qui menace le S. Apôtre. "Alors ne peuvant plus se tenir caché, il s'approcha du Dome-" niquin, et en l'embrassant, lui avoua qu'il avoit dans ce moment-" là beaucoup appris de luib."

b Felilien,—Entretiens fur les vies des Peintres, &c. tome iii. p. 379.

I will just observe, farther, that this procept, or rather counsel, of Aristotle, would appear the less strange to the Poets of his time. because, as he himself tells us, the earlier Tragic Poets were also actors: ὑπεκρινούτο γαρ άυτοι Τραγμβίας δ. ποιηταί το πρώτον.— Rist. III. 1.-But, indeed, I am to far from feeing any thing ftrange or improbable in this advice, that, on the contrary, if it be liable to any objection at all, it is, perhaps, rather to that of being unnecessary: for I fearce believe, that any Poet of genius, antient or modern, ever yet composed a Tragedy without practifing involuntarily, in some degree or other, what the critic here recommends. No dramatic Poetry, I think, can be lefs chargeable with the parison, than that of the French. Yet M. Marmontel fees no difficulty in this precept. In his account of this part of Aristotle's work, he fays, "Il " recommande que l'on soit présent à l'action que l'on veut peindre, " que l'on se pénetre soi-meme des sentimens que l'on doit exprimer, "et qu'on imite, en composant, l'action des personnages qu'on " met sur la scene: méthode qui contribue réellement à donner au " style plus de chaleur et de vérité. [Poet. Franc. I. p. 15.] Mr. Mason says of the late ingenious and amiable Mr. Whitehead, whose dramatic compositions, whatever other merit may justly be allowed them, certainly bear no marks of any unmanageable phrenfy in the Poet,—that "he is apt to believe, that he always acted, or at "least declaimed, while he was composing for the stage." If, then, even the modern Tragic Poet is, almost necessarily, more or lefs, "an actor in composing," there can furely be little difficulty in conceiving an Æschylus, or a Sophocles, in their free, solitary, and unwritten meditations, to have given ftill greater scope to their imaginations, and, ΌΣΑ ΔΥΝΑΤΟΝ, at least, σχημασι συναπεργασασθαι. We must, for once, divest ourselves of modern ideas, and think, not of a spruce Poet of "these degenerate days," shut up in his study, with his pen in his hand, and his writing-table before him—but of Euripides, retired into that lonely, dark, and shaggy cavern, which is faid to have been the favourite scene of his Tragic 3 C

Tragic meditations. "Philochorus refert, in infula Salamine "fpeluncam esse tetram et horridam, quam nos vidimus, in quê Euri"pides Tragadias scriptitârit."—Aul. Gell. xv. 20.

N O T E 137.

P. 98. For by natural sympathy, &c.

Πιθανωτατοι γας ἀπο της ἀυτης φυσεως δι ἐν παθεσιν ἐισι.—Nothing, I think, can be more forced and improbable, than the fense given to the words, ἀπο της ἀυτης φυσεως, by Victorius, and, after him, by Goulston and Dacier: "eorum qui pari naturâ ingenioque præ-"diti, &c.—De deux hommes qui seront d'un égal genie, celui qui se mettra dans la passion sera toujours plus persuasis."

If the text be right, the only fense I see is that given by Heinsius:—" propter similitudinem ejustem natura:"—i. e. "from na-" tural sympathy."—But I am much disposed to suspect, that we should read, ἀπ' ΑΥΤΗΣ ΤΗΣ φυσεως—ab ipså natura;—Ipså natura comparatum est, ut, &c.—A similar, but contrary, transposition, of the same words, occurred at the end of the second chapter: ἐν ἀντη δε τη διαφορα—plainly, as Victorius observes, instead of ἐν ΤΗι ΑΥΤΗι—. And, indeed, this sense is so obvious, that Robortelli, Castelvetro, and Piccolomini, have all given it in their translations, though certainly not warranted by the text. However, as the other reading seems to express, though somewhat obscurely, the same idea, I have not departed from it any farther, than by adopting the explanatory version of Heinsius, which takes the meaning, and leaves the obscurity.

N O T E 138.

P. 98. WE SHARE THE AGITATION OF THOSE WHO APPEAR TO BE TRULY AGITATED—THE ANGER OF THOSE WHO APPEAR TO BE TRULY ANGRY.

Χειμαίνει δ χειμαζομεν©, και χαλεπαίνα δ δογίζομεν⑤ άληθινωτατα. have given that fense of this passage, in which all the commentators I have feen are perfectly agreed. But I cannot diffemble a difficulty which has always occurred to me in this interpretation, though, to my furprise, I have not found it any where taken notice of. I mean, that it gives a transitive sense to the verbs, xemana, and χαλεπαινει. With respect, particularly, to the verb χαλεπαιvew, (for the other occurs but feldom,) the difficulty from the general, if not the constant, use of it, as a verb neuter, seems not eafily to be overcome. This use of it, by Aristotle himself, and by other profe writers, is fo common and well known, that it would be mere trifling to produce inflances. That it is never used by them transitively, it would be rash, perhaps, even in those, whose Greek reading is much more extensive than my own, to affirm. I can only fay, that I have never feen a clear instance of it, either in prose, or verse. The lexicographers, indeed, send us to Homer: but without giving any instance that appears to me to be at all decisive². And, on the other hand, the word occurs clearly in its usual and intransitive sense in other passages: as, Il. Ξ . 256. Π . 386. Σ . 103, &c. But even admitting the verb to be now and then used by Homer in a sense indisputably transitive, it feems very unlikely, that Aristotle should transplant so rare, and poetical, a use of the word, into plain and philosophical profe; especially as other verbs were probably at hand, if he meant what he is supposed to mean, which would not have been liable to this ambiguity.

This difficulty has fometimes led me to suspect, that the passage may possibly, after all, admit of a different sense; and that Arishotle may have meant only to fay this:-" The Poet should work himself, as far as may be, into the passion he is to represent, "by even affurning the countenance, and the gestures, which are its natural expressions. For they, of course, have most probabi-" lit and truth in their imitation, who actually feel, in some "degree, the passion: and no one expresses agitation of mind (yes-" μαινει) fo naturally, (αληθινωτατα,) as he who is really agitated, " (χειμαζομενώ,) or expresses anger (χαλεπαινει) so naturally, as he " who is really angry (ogyi (our D.)" - Thus, the forms, xemaives, χαλεπαιτει, will retain their neuter fignification, referring to the Poet's expression of the passion in his composition; as, yequatoper , and opyious, refer to the internal feeling of the passion, which he has excited in his own mind. Xeina (ecola, -to be violently agitated in mind: - Xemanen-to express that agitation by words or actions : δργιζεσθαι to be angry: χαλεπαινειν to express that anger by words or actions.—It will, perhaps, be objected, that χαλεπαι. sear, used as a verb neuter, appears to be synonymous with degrifes- θxi . That it may be often fo, I will not take upon me to deny: but numerous instances may certainly be produced, where it is not sowhere it clearly denotes fomething beyond the mere internal passion. In this line of Homer, for example;

Ζευς, έτε δη ξ ἀνδρεσσι ΚΟΤΕΣΣΑΜΕΝΟΣ ΧΑΛΕΙΗ.ΝΗ:.

II. II. 386.

^{-- &}quot; iratus feeviat;"—where the anger of Jupiter is expressed by μοτεσσαμέν &; but χαλεπριη goes on to the external demonstration of it, ότε λαβροτατον χεει ύδωρ. υ. 385.

This verb feems to be rare. I neither recollect, nor can, at prefent, find, any other inflance of it, than in the 9th Pattoral of Theocritus, v. 20, where it is used impersonally: proceeding, i. e. when it is winter. An inflance, which, as far as it goes, is in tayour of the sense I would give to the word here.

So, too, Od. T. v. 83.

Thus, again, Il. Z. 256, of Jupiter:

- ὁ δ' ἐπεχεομενΦ. ΧΑΛΕΠΛΙΝΕ
 ΡΙΠΤΑΖΩΝ ΚΑΤΑ ΔΩΜΑ ΘΕΟΥΣ.

In the very passage adduced to exemplify the transitive use of this verb, II. T. 183, it appears to have the same dense: for the words, δτε τις προτερ. χαλεπηνη, allude to Agamemnon's own words, II. B. 378.

Και γαρ έγων Αχίλευς τε μαχεσταμεθ', είνεια κερης,. Αντιβιοίς ΕΠΕΕΣΣΙΝ' έγω δ' ΗΡΧΟΝ ΧΑΛΕΠΑΙΝΩΝ.

Χαλεπαινειν is here, I think, put as fynonymous with μαχεσθαι επεεσσιν. Agamemnon conferles, that he himself gave the first verbal provocation; alluding, I think, to his speech, v. 131, where he first hints at the seizure of Briseis. For though Achilles speaks, indeed, somewhat roughly to the king in the preceding speech, yet his wrath cannot properly be said to commence before the subsequent speech, Ω μοι, αναιδείην, &c. v. 149.

I shall add only an instance or two more.—In the first book of Plato's Repub. Socrates says to Thrasymachus,—ἐλεωσθαι ἐν ἡμας πολυ μαλλον ἐκυ⑤ ἐςι πε, ὑπο ὑμων των δεινων, ἡ ΧΑΛΕΠΑΙΝΕΣΘΑΙ—i.e. " we deserve rather to be pitied by you wise men, than to be "feolded at."—In the passage quoted NOTE 22, p. 188, Plato says of a dog,—ἐν μεν ἀν ιδη ἀγνωτα, ΧΑΛΕΠΑΙΝΕΙ:—ἐν δ' ἀν γνωριμον, ΑΣΠΑΖΕΤΑΙ: " fawns on those he knows, and barks at strangers." In the Memorabilia of Xenophon, II. 2, we have—Αισθομεν δε ποτε Λαμωροκλεα, τον ωρεσευτατον ὑκν ἑλυτε, ωρος την μητερα ΧΑΛΕΠΑΙΝΟΝΤΑ: i.e. " when he had keard him speaking angrily to his mother."

It feems, then, that the passage will fairly admit of the meaning. I have proposed. And whether that meaning would not be more.

to Aristotle's purpose, than the other, I willingly submit to the reader's consideration. For why recommend it to the Poet to help his imagination by action, when he composes?—plainly, for the sake of the effect of this method upon his poetry; that his expression of passion may have more of truth and nature; that his characters may χειμανίνι, οι χαλεπανίνι, αληθινώτατα*. Now it seems more consonant to this purpose, that the words which follow as the reason of the advice, should refer to this immediate effect upon the Poet's work, which is the object of the advice, than to the more remote and implied effect of the work upon the spectator. It seems, indeed, to have been this reference to the audience, in the usual way of understanding the passage, that led Madius into the mistake of supposing this precept intended, not for the Poet, but for the Player.

Such are my objections to the fense hitherto given to this passage, and my reasons for thinking, that its meaning may have been mistaken. I abandon them, without reserve, to the judgment of the learned reader: in my own, it is impossible for me to conside, when I reslect, that the whole band of commentators, who have preceded me, have acquiesced, without doubt or scruple, in that interpretation which to me appears so unsatisfactory.

N O T E 139.

P. 98. GREAT NATURAL QUICKNESS OF PARTS -----

Ευφυϊα Τοιητικη έςω. Ευφυΐα ΟΞΥΤΗΣ. Hefychius. See also Casaub. upon Athenæus, p. 454, and Suidas, voc. Ευφυα, and Ευφυΐα, where the passage he quotes from Alex. Aphrod. shews

* It is somewhat in favour of this interpretation, that it gives the adverb, announced, its most natural and obvious construction, with the verbs, xemaner and xakemaner. As the passage is commonly understood, it must be joined with the participles.

what was the common idea of ἐυρυῖα, though its propriety is disputed. The ἐυρυεις were generally understood to be ὁι ἑαδιως—μανθανοντες, ὁμοιως δε ἐχοντες προς παντα τα μαθηματα, &c. The passage seems to allude to Ethic. Nicom. III. 5. p. 113. cd. Wilk.

No epithet can be more exactly adapted to the ἐυφυης, than that of ἐυπλως Φ, which follows; a man of quick, mimetic parts, who can turn bimfelf, as we fay, to every thing with equal facility, and mould himfelf, without effort, to every form. But the word had confiderable latitude, and would have been applied by the antients, to the genius of a Shakspeare, the talents of a Foote a, or the docility of a school-boy.

N O T E 140.

P. 98. OR, AN ENTHUSIASM ALLIED TO MADNESS——.

H parme.—My translation here will, I fear, be thought too paraphrastical. But this is one among many passages, that have occurred, where I have found it impossible to give, at the same time, word for word, and idea for idea. This, indeed, is the great misfortune of translation; for what Mr. Harris has observed is too true,—that "much of the force of the original will neces" farily be lost in the translation, where single words in one language cannot be found corresponding to single words in the "other".

^a Philip of Macedon would have careffed such a man as Foote. He delighted, we are told, ἀνθρωποις ΤΟΙΣ ΕΥΦΥΕΣΙ καλεμενοις, και ΤΑ ΓΕΛΟΙΑ ΛΕΓΟΥΣΙ ΚΑΙ ΠΟΙΟΥΣΙ. Athen. 260.

^b Παρα των ΕΥΦΥΩΝ, fays Ifocrates, speaking of scholars, δει μεγαν λαμβανειν μισθον, ότι ΠΟΛΛΑ ΜΑΝΘΛΝΟΥΣΙ· $\pi \alpha_{\xi} x$ δε των ΑΦΥΩΝ, ότι πολλες κοπες παρεχεσι.—An admirable inscription for a school door, ^{*} Philof. Arrang. p. 211, note.

The word, paras, wanted no explanation to Grack readers, to whom, from the writings of Plato, in particular, it was familiar to confider enthuhafm of every kind, as a species of madness. They would understand no more, from Aristotle's expression, than that comparative infanity which Cicero has so exactly expressed:—"Poetam bonum neminem——sine inflammatione animorum existere" posse, et sine quodam afflatu quasi surorisc."—But what can a mere modern reader think, when he is told, in Dacier's translation, that, to succeed in Poetry, "il faut avoir un genie excellent, ou" etre furieux?"

Nor could I, without danger of confounding the philosopher's liftinction, have rendered enquine by the fingle word genius; which, as we usually apply it to the fine arts, implies much of that very warmth, and illusive power, of imagination, that "inflammatia" animorum" which Aristotle meant to express by the other word, penneer.

I must not omit, that this whole passage receives considerable illustration from another, in the Problems, pointed out by Mr. Winstanley in his edition, p. 2924.

If Aristotle had given any instance of the paras among the Tragic Poets, it would, in all probability, have been Æschylus. It is pleasant to observe the appearance which the wild invention and serocious sublimity of his Prometheus, had to the eye of a Prench critic, of admirable good sense, indeed, but, raging rapour. If e crois," says Fontenelle, "qu' Eschile ctoit une Maniere

b See, particularly, the Phadrus, p. 244, 245, ed. Serr.—Arifotle himself, too, in his Rhetoric, says—ENΘΕΟΝ γας is ποιοσω, III. 7. ed. Duval.—I cannot help just reminding the reader of the admirable humour with which Horace ridicules the prectical about of this idea, in his Art of Poetry, v. 295—304.

De Or. II. 46.

⁴ P. 817, B. ed. Duval. 'Ozei; δε λιείν &c.—to ἐμεσιη, C. The reading, ἐμεσατικ, inflered of ἐξεταστικ, if it flood in need of any confirmation, would be confirmed by this fingle passage beyond all doubt.

" DE FOU, qui avoit l'imagination trés~vive, et pas trop reglée"." He would probably have faid much the same of Shakspeare. The charge certainly cannot be retorted upon the French Tragic writers. It is related of the unfortunate Nat Lee, that, when he was in Bedlam, fomebody had the inhumanity to tell him, it was a very eafy thing to write like a madman. "No," replied the Poet, "it is not an easy thing to write like a madman; but it is a " very easy thing to write like a fool." I believe these two things are almost equally difficult to our ingenious neighbours. It would be hard to detect Racine writing like a fool. But I confess I never read him without wishing he had written a little more like a madman. We must allow him much merit; -but he never "rolled his eye" in the "fine phrenfy" of the Poet; he knew little of "the tricks" of "flrong imagination." The character given of him by Lord Kaims appears to me perfectly exact and just; that "he is always fensible, generally correct, never falls low, " maintains a moderate degree of dignity without reaching the "fublime, paints delicately the tender passions, but is a stranger "to the genuine language of enthusiastic or fervid passion "."

I have often wondered, what it was that could attach Mr. Gray fo strongly to a Poet whose genius was so little analogous to his own. I must confess I cannot, even in the dramatic fragment given us by Mr. Mason, discover any other resemblance to Racine, than in the length of the speeches. Its fault, indeed, is Racine's; its beauties are, surely, of a higher order. What pity, that a work of genius, should have been smothered in its birth, by a little cold and trisling criticism!—We have, indeed, been told, that "it was certainly no loss to the English stage, that Agrippina was [&]quot;Tome ix. p. 415,—" Il me femble," fays this agreeable writer, "qu'il ne fau"droit donner dans le sublime, qu' à fon corps desendant." [Presace to his Hist. des Oracles.] No wonder then, that he could not relish Æschylus.

Elements of Crit. vol. i. p. 488.

² See Letter xvi. Sect. 4, of the Memoirs of Mr. Gray.

"never finished:" but we have been told it by the same critic who has pronounced, also, that the BARD of Gray, only "en"deavours at sublimity;" who saw in the juvenile Poems of Milton "no promise of Paradise Lost;" and who has admitted, with seeming complacence, into the catalogue of English Poets, such names as Blackmore, Yalden, and Pomfret—

" Alcandrumque Haliumque Noemonaque Prytanimque!"-

N O T E 141.

P. 98. WHEN THE POET INVENTS A SUBJECT—.

Here is a confusion of various readings, none of them, I think, free from fuspicion. How the sense given to the passage by Victorius, and almost all the commentators, is fairly to be obtained from any of them, I confess, I never could see. I follow the common, and, in my opinion, the least suspicious, reading—TEG TE² λογες τες πεποιημενες -. And I understand Aristotle to speak of fubjects, either wholly invented by the Poet, like the Avd of Agatho, or, having only fome very flight and general foundation in history or tradition.—Aoy — the general story, or argument.— (Λογ®— Ή ΤΟΥ ΔΡΑΜΑΤΟΣ ΥΠΟΘΕΣΙΣ. Hefychius.)—ΚΑΙ αυτον ποιεντα,—because, I suppose, such arguments were commonly drawn up by others, probably in the Διδασκαλιαι, and, perhaps, prefixed to the copies of the play. But here, Aristotle-" poetam "etiam ipfum hoc facere jubet; quod novum erat, et inusita-"tum:"—as the force of KAI ATTON feems rightly explained by Victorius.

^{*} της ΔΕ λογως, which, according to Victorius has MIS, authority, would, perhaps, be preferable.

N O T E 142.

P. 99. WHEN HE HAS GIVEN NAMES TO HIS CHARAC-

This feems to flew plainly, that by logge memorgueurs the critic means only fuch subjects as were of the Poet's own invention". For he fays—first, form a general sketch of your fable; then, give names to your characters. This manifestly implies, that the names were not already fixed by history or tradition, but were at the Poet's choice. To avoid this difficulty, the Abbé Batteux translates, "on remet les noms b." But this, certainly, is not what Aristotle fays; and it is too trisling, furely, to be what he means. If the names are given by the particular history which the Poet follows, what purpose will it answer to omit them in his plan?—They will certainly be in his mind; they may as well be upon his paper. In short, the method here recommended by Aristotle seems perfectly absurd and nugatory, upon any other fupposition than that of a story, either wholly invented by the Poet, or, of which, at least, he owes only some slight hint to fact, and real life. In this case, and in this only, it is, that the subject first presents itself to the Poet's mind in a general and abstracted view, which he afterwards circumstantiates by time, place, and names, and fills up by the detail of particular epifodes and fcenes.

That this is the meaning, will appear, I think, still more clearly from the 9th chapter, with which this passage should be compared. What is leve said of the method to be pursued by b And, fee his note, No 3, upon chap. xvi.—It is the explanation of Beni:—"jam on nomina imponi jubet, non tam illa fingendo, quam reddendo."

² As, πεποιημενον όνομα, cap. xxi. "a word of the Poet's invention."—πεποιημενα σημεια—πεποιημεναι άναγγωρισεις, cap. xvi. and, πεποιημενα όνοματα, cap. ix. " names in- "vented by the Poet."

Tragic Poets, answers exactly to what is there said of the Comic: συςησαντες γας τον μυθον δια των ἐπιστων, ΌΥΤΩ ΤΑ ΤΥΧΟΝΤΑ 'ΟΝΟΜΑΤΑ ΕΠΙΤΙΘΕΑΣΙ;—with this difference, indeed, that the Comic writer may give whatever names he pleases; while the Tragic generally adopts bistorical names, even when his subject is seigned. Yet Aristotle, there, not only allows that Tragedy, as well as Comedy, may be all invention, both plot and names, but even says, that it would be "ridiculous" to think otherwise: γελοιον τετο ζητεω. And he immediately adds, that it is the invention or making of his fable, (not of his verse only,) that truly constitutes the Poets.

N O T E 143.

P. 99. THAT THE EPISODES BELONG PROPERLY TO THE SUBJECT—.

See NOTE 37.—Here are two inflances given by Aristotle of what he means by ἐπεισοδια in dramatic Poetry. They confirm, I think, what was said in that note. That Orestes should be taken, by some means or other, and should, by some means or other, be javed, were essential parts of the Poet's sable. These were not episodes, in Aristotle's view; for he expressly includes them both in that general sketch of the story, which is previous to the intertexture of the episodes:—ἐλθων δε και ΑΗΦΘΕΙΣ—and, ἐντευθεν δε ἡ ΣΩΤΗΡΙΑ. The episodes are the circumstances by which the Poet chose to essect this capture, and this escape; i. e. the madness of Orestes, and the ablution of the statue; or rather, these sacts drawn out into some particularity of descriptive narration, so as to form distinct, though subordinate, parts of the action; for this, perhaps, made a part of Aristotle's idea of ἐπεισοδιον.—And the c Cap. ix.—Trans. Part II. Sect. 6.

examples here given feem to confirm this. See the Iphig. in Tauris, v. 260, to 340.—v. 1153, &c.—And, particularly, the narration of the $\partial \gamma \in \lambda \otimes \gamma$, v. 1327, &c.

From the very observation, that these episodes should be properly related to the subject, and from what he adds of the difference of dramatic and epic episodes in point of length, it clearly appears, that, as I observed in the note referred to, the word is not applied to Tragedy in a different sense from that in which it is applied to the Epic Poem.

N O T E 144.

P. 99. BUT IN THE EPIC THEY ARE THE MEANS OF DRAWING OUT THE POEM TO ITS PROPER LENGTH.

Ή δ' ἐποποιία τετοις μηκυνεται.—Compare cap. xxiv. Εχει δε w_{0} ς το ἐωεκτεινεσθαι, x. τ. αλ.—to, ἐωεισοδιοις.

N O T E 145.

P. 99. THE GENERAL STORY OF THE ODYSSEY—LIES IN A SMALL COMPASS.

Ming., (instead of $\mu\alpha\kappa\rho$.) has now the support of a manuscript. See, ed. Ox. 1780, with the learned editor of which I perfectly agree. $\Lambda \circ \gamma \otimes$ is plainly used here in the same sense as before, for the general argument, or summary, of the Poem: whereas, if we read $\mu\alpha\kappa\rho$, it can mean only the entire story at full length, with all its episodes. Farther; the epitome of the Odysley which sola They could not therefore be confidered by Aristotle as "parties necessaires de "l'action," according to Le Bossu's definition, lib. ii. ch. 6.

lows, is evidently the exemplification of the preceding affertion, that the story of the Odyssey, stripped of its episodes, is very skort.

Homer himself has given us a still more general outline of the Poem in two lines and a half;—συνοψω waσης της Οδυσσειας, as the scholiast has observed upon it:

Φην, κακα πολλα παθοντ', όλεσαντ' άπο παντας έταιρες, Αγνωςον παντεσσ.ν, έεικοςω ένιαυτω, Οικαδ' έλευσεσθαι.—— Οd. Β. 174.

—where, ολεσαντ ζάωο ωαντας έταιρες, is equivalent to Aristotle's μουκ οντ.

N O T E 146.

P. 99. PERSECUTED BY NEPTUNE

ΠΑΡΑΦΥΛΑΤΤΟΜΕΝΟΥ ύπο τε Ποσειδαν .-- The fame idea is thus expressed by Virgil:

nec Teucris addita Juno Usquam aberit. En. VI. 90.

—upon which passage the reader will find an excellent and useful note in the best of all editions of this Poet, that of Heyne.

Horace comes still nearer to the word wαραφυλαττεσθαι:

Incontinentis nec Tityi'jecur
Relinquit ales, nequitiæ ADDITUS CUSTOS.
Lib. III. Ode iv.

N O T E 147.

P. 99. AND MAKING HIMSELF KNOWN TO SOME OF HIS FAMILY—.

Aναγνωρισας τινας, ἀυτοις ἐωιθεμεν. This is all very strange, and, probably, very corrupt; as may appear, merely from the awkward and cacophonous repetition of the pronoun—ΑΥΤΟΣ ἀφικνειται---ΑΥΤΟΙΣ εωιθεμεν. ΑΥΤΟΣ μεν ἐσωθη.

And what is, avayvaçısas τνας?—Certainly, not what one expects. Ulysses, we know, was discovered by the nurse, and discovered himself to Eumæus, and the herdsman, and to Telemachus; but I do not recollect that he discovers any one. Castelvetro saw this; and he says, that "onesw is to be understood; and that the signification of the word avayvaçısas here must be observed, which is, not that Ulysses discovered any of his friends, but that he made himself known to them." But we have no authority, that I know of, for this use of avayvaçısas with an accusative case. Piccolomini, too, understands this passage as Castelvetro did—"datosi" à conoscere ad alcuni." And the Abbé Batteux—" se fait recon"noitre," &c.

But what, again, is, autois emiles per ?—Does autois refer to the friends, or to the enemies, of Ulysses?—Is emile per deceiving, imposing on, as it is rendered by Victorius, and others after him, or, as others understand it, attacking? for it will bear either of these senses. I have preferred the latter as most obvious, and, on the whole, most to the purpose. Emitibe person is used by Aristotle in this sense, Rhet. II. 5. It generally, I believe, implies an attack more or less insidious, such as that of Ulysses upon the suitors. The scholiast upon Homer, Od. Y. 156, observes, that a day of festivity was made choice of, as furnishing a favourable opportunity of attacking the suitors: ίνα των ἀνδρων ωτρι την έορτην καταγινομενων, ἐνκαιρον ἐχη το ΕΠΙΤΙΘΕΣΘΑΙ ΤΟΙΣ ΜΝΗΣΤΗΡΣΙ.

N O T E 148.

P. 100. I CALL COMPLICATION, ALL THAT IS BETWEEN THE BEGINNING OF THE PIECE, AND THE LAST PART, &c.

Aristotle is here, as usual, very short and dry in the information he bestows upon us concerning this δεσις and λυσις. I wish he had given us a definition of their meanings, instead of a mere designation of their places. One would suspect, on the first view, from the mention of a change eig euturian only, (in which reading all the MSS. I think, agree,) from his infrance, (if it be the fame Tragedy as he before cited, cap. xi.) and from the common acceptation of the word hung itself, that he was speaking only of those Tragedies in which the principal characters are extricated from the difficulties they were involved in, and the end is happy, indeed, the way in which Le Bossu, and others after him, explain this næud and denouement, leads naturally to this idea, and feems hardly confiftent with their allowing, as they do, that the denouement may be either calamitous or prosperous. For they explain the næud, or deous, by "obstacles à vaincre" efforts contraires— "i. e. aux efforts du beros pour l'execution de son desseine."-" Les " obstacles présentés s'appéllent næuds, et la maniere dont on les "force, fe nomme, denouement denouement de This will do very well for Æneas, or Ulysses. But when Oedipus finds himself guilty of

- * Le Bossu, Traité du Poeme, Ep. II. 16.
- b Batteux's note on this passage.
- c f.e Boffu, II. 13.
- Batteux, Principes de la Lit. tome ii. p. 226.

parricide and incest, and, from a state of regal dignity and happiness, becomes a wretched, blind, and banished vagabond—this is but a strange way of furmounting obstacles.

The truth is, that the obstacles of the devis, or the knot, are those which are presented to the mind of the spectator; the disficulty overcome is that of seeing how the piece will terminate. And thus, indeed, the Abbé Batteux more accurately expresses himself elsewhere:—" Le næud dans le Cinna est, de seavoir si Cinna tuera "Auguste," &c.". The duois is, to the spectator, the solution of the problem, "How will all this end?" And we may add, the more difficult the problem, the greater the pleasure of the solution.

It may be objected, that this is applicable only to those Tragedies, the subjects of which are totally unknown to the spectator; and it may be asked, "Where is the problem to be solved, in those "dramas, which we have repeatedly seen and read, and of which "we are perfectly acquainted with the catastrophe, and every "incident that leads to it?" To this I can only answer, that it is a fact, and certainly a curious fact, that it makes little difference, or none at all, in the sympathetic interest which a spectator feels during the course of the action, whether he knows, or does not know, beforehand, how the piece will end. "Quelque prévenu que l'on soit de la maniere dont tout va se résoudre, la marche de "l'action en écarte la réminiscence: l'impression de ce que l'on weit "empêche de résléchir à ce que l'on sçait; et c'est par ce pressige "que les spectateurs qui se laissent toucher, pleurent vingt sois au "même spectacle.—[Marmontel, Poet. Franc. ii. 220.]

The term $\lambda \nu \sigma \iota \varsigma$, therefore, is as applicable to the calamitous catastrophe of the Ogdipus, as to the satisfactory conclusion of the Iphigenia in Tauris. For Aristotle expressly gives these parts, e Princip. de la Lit. tome iii. p. 51. And so, too, Le Bossu, where he says of the nœud, that it lasts "autant de temps que l'esprit du lecteur est suspendu sur l'évenement de ces efforts contraires," &c. ch. xiii. Dacier, too, talks in the same equivocal language. Sec his notes, 1, 2, and 3.

3 E

as parts of every Tragedy. Est de $\Pi A \Sigma H \Sigma$ $\tau \rho \alpha \gamma \omega \delta i \alpha s$, τo det, destis, τo de, lusis.

N O T E 149.

P. 100. THE LYNCEUS OF THEODECTES -----

Castelvetro has guessed, with some ingenuity, the subject and plot of this Tragedy, from Hyginus, Fab. 45. See Goulston's supplemental version, which is taken from him. It seems, however, very improbable, that a Tragedy should be denominated from a person who had no other share in the action, than that it passed under his roof.

Dacier understands this to be the Lynceus mentioned before, cap. xi. All I see is, that his application of the word, παιδιον, to Lynceus the busband of Hypermnestra, cannot be admitted. The diminutive παιδιον, is, I believe, never used but to signify a child. In this respect, certainly, Castelvetro's conjecture has greatly the advantage; as it has, also, in the explanation of ἀιτιασεως τε θανατε, which, in Dacier, is terribly forced. See his version.

N O T E 150.

P. 100. THERE ARE FOUR KINDS OF TRAGEDY, DEDU-CIBLE FROM SO MANY PARTS WHICH HAVE BEEN MEN-TIONED.

It is incumbent on a commentator to state, as clearly as he can, the difficulties of his author, whether he be able to remove them, or not. This has not been done with respect to this passage, in any of the comments that I have seen.

Ariflotle

Aristotle says, Τραγωδιας δε είδη είσι τεσσαρα τοσαυτα ΓΑΡ και τα μερη ελεχθη. "There are four species of Tragedy; for so many " also are the parts which have been mentioned." This is faving, as expressly as words can fay it, that the four different species of Tragedy correspond to, and, of course, arise from, four different parts already mentioned. Now what are those parts? Four parts of quantity have indeed been mentioned; (cap. xii.) but these are quite out of the question. If we have recourse to what are called the parts of quality^a, these are six; and if, with Dacier, we reduce them to four, by throwing out the decoration and the mulic, the four that remain, i. e. fable, manners, fentiments, and diction, will furnish out, among them, only one of the species of Tragedy enumerated —that which is denominated young. These, then, cannot be the four parts pointed at as the foundation of the four species. There remain only the parts which Aristotle calls μερη ΜΥΘΟΥ: the parts, not of Tragedy, but of one of the effential parts of Tragedy —the Fable. These he enumerated in the 11th chapter, and to these, the commentators, in general, are agreed in understanding Aristotle to allude.

But the difficulty here is, that he refers to four parts mentioned, and here are only three—i. e. $\pi \varepsilon \rho \pi \varepsilon \tau \varepsilon \alpha$, $\alpha \nu \alpha \gamma \nu \omega \rho \tau \varepsilon \varepsilon$, (which he expressly calls $\delta \nu \sigma \mu \nu \theta \varepsilon \mu \varepsilon \rho \eta$,) and, thirdly, $\pi \alpha \theta \mathcal{D}$: TPITON $\delta \varepsilon$, $\pi \alpha \theta \mathcal{D}$.—There is no mention of $H\theta \mathcal{D}$, to furnish his third species, the moral Tragedy; nor, indeed, was it, by any means, to be expected there, where he is professedly enumerating the parts of the Fable. $\Pi \alpha \theta \eta$, in the sense in which the word is there used, may, unquestionably, be considered as parts of the Fable; $\dot{\eta} \theta \eta$, or manners, cannot.

a Cap. vi. Transl. Part II. Sect. 2.

b Transl. Part II. Soct. 9, at the end.

[•] ΠαθΘ, in its usual sense, of passion, is a part, not of the μυθΘ, but of the Δια-νεια. (See cap. xix. Transl. Part II. Sect. 22.) But, in the sense defined cap. xi. (Transl. Part II. Sect. 9.) it is an αετίου—ΠΡΑΞΙΣ φθαρτυω, &c. and, therefore, part of the plot, or συνθεσις πραγματων, as much as the revolution, and discovery.

The Abbé Batteux thinks the ethic species is tacitly implied, as the opposite, or negative, of the pathetic. The three parts of the fable, περιπετεια, ἀναγνωρισις, παθω, give, directly, only two species of Tragedy; the two first constituting, (one, or both of them,) the complicated, (πεπλεγμειην,) and the third, the pathetic, or difaftrous, Tragedy. The two other species are only the negatives of these. If the fable is without revolution or discovery, the Tragedy is fimple, as opposed to complicated; if, without maln, or disafters, it is ηθικη, as opposed to παθητικη.—Such is the explanation of this ingenious writer; which feems to be much favoured by the manner in which these species are arranged afterwards, when applied to Epic Poetry in cap. xxiv.; where we have $-\dot{\eta}$ $\gamma \alpha \rho$ ΑΠΛΗΝ ή ΠΕΠΛΕΓΜΕΝΗΝ, -ή ΗΘΙΚΗΝ ή ΠΑΘΗΤΙΚΗΝ, δει είναι; and, also, by the frequent opposition of made and note, madyrinou and ranco, in antient writers.—It may, indeed, be objected, that this cannot be reconciled to Aristotle's words—τοσαυτα γαρ και τα μερη ΈΛΕΧΘΗ; which feem to refer clearly to four parts that had been all expressly mentioned. But, if we should suppose Aristotle here to confider that as faid, which was only implied, and as explained, which was only hinted, we should, perhaps, take no liberty that is not warranted by the magisterial and elliptic brevity of his general ftyle, and even by fimilar inflances in his writings?. But even this will not entirely remove the difficulty, while, by the d —— 'ANEΥ περιπετειας η ἀναγνωρισμε, as he says above, in defining the simple st. Ue. Cup. x.

See his note; and his Principes de la Lit. tome iii. p. 84.

f See, for instance, Rhet. III. 17. Quintil. VI. 2, p. 299, 300, ed. Gibs. &c.—I am aware, indeed, that in this opposition, παθ@ is not taken in the dramatic sense, of blood shed, disafters, &c. but in the usual sense of passion. But as this sense is, in sact, involved in the former, (for we can scarce conceive a disastrous, or, as we call it, a deef, Tragedy, that is not also highly pathetic, or passionate,) this is not, perhaps, any material objection.

parts alluded to, we understand Aristotle to mean only the pear μυθε of the 11th chapter: because ήθω, as I before observed, could be neither mentioned, nor implied, as a part of the fable. Perhaps, therefore, he meant to use the word usen in a general sense, as he clearly does use it, cap. xxiv. και τα ΜΕΡΗ, έξω μελ. και όψεως, τ'αυτα' και ΓΑΡ περιπετειών δει, κ. τ. αλ.—where the και ΓΑΡ shews, that the parts he had just mentioned included both the fix conflituent parts of Tragedy, and the three parts of the fable which he enumerates. If we understand $\mu \epsilon \rho \eta$ in this way, the meaning will only be, that so many different parts, (of one kind or other,) have been mentioned (ἐλεχθη,) from which these species may be deduced: these are, the three megn mule, which furnish the complicated, the fimple, and the pathetic, species; and the second of the essential parts of Tragedy, 1900, which, though indeed it be a part of every Tragedy, admits, according to Aristotle's own account, of more or less, and, when predominant, may be characteristic of another fpecies, the ethic, or moral Tragedy, naturally enough opposed to the pathetic.

I confess I see no other possible consistent sense that can be given to this passage, as we now read it: for four parts are here mentioned; and four parts cannot be made out, if we confine ourselves to the psen MYGOY in cap. xi.

Dacier feems to have perceived this; and his explanation agrees so far with mine, that he, also, makes "la peripetie, la recon"noisance, la passion, et les mœurs," the sour parts that produce the sour sorts of Tragedy. But when, in order to reduce the seven parts, (i. e. sable, manners, diction, sentiments, discovery, revolution, disasters,) to the sour which he wants, he rejects three, i. e. sable, diction, and sentiments, because they are common to all Tragedy, he makes a distinction for which there seems to be no soundation; the manners being equally included by Aristotle among those parts which are expressly HASHS τραγωβίας μερη. But, though all these parts necessarily belong, in some degree or other, to every Tragedy, any one of them may be fo predominant, as to characte. rize a Tragedy, and give it, if we pleafe, a specific denomination. Thus, there may be, and there is, such a species as the sentimental Tragedy, of which, in the critic's language, το όλον ή Διανοια:another, of which the language may be the most striking character --- ής το όλον ή Λεξις k; and he himself speaks of a fort of Tragedy that might very well be denominated, ή Οπτική, of which examples are not wanting on the modern stage. The Italian opera is a Tragedy, ής το όλον ές ν ή Μελοποιία. — But Aristotle's business was not to enumerate all the different species which want of taste or judgment might produce, but those only which were considered as legitimate, and fuch as found criticism would approve. Hence, he has recourfe, for the formation of the four regular and authorifed species, only to the two first and most important of the six constituent parts of Tragedy—the FABLE, and the MANNERS.

[.] Сар. vi.—àvet de nouv yetot' àv (.c. Траурд.и) &с. i. Сар. vi.

But after all, when we have made the best we can of the text in this passage, we must allow, I believe, that it is more for the credit of Aristotle to suppose it faulty. And that it is note for the rather inclined to think, as one difficulty still remains. The expression—" there are four forts of Tragedy; for jo rany parts "have been mentioned"—seems clearly to imply, not merely, that those four forts are deducible, in some way or other, from those parts, but, as I at first observed, that they, respectively, arise from those parts, each of which produces its correspondent species of Tragedy. But this, as we have seen, is by no means the case. Of the four parts, only $\pi\alpha\theta$, and $\eta\theta$, produce directly their correspondent species, the $\pi\alpha\theta\eta\tau\omega\eta$, and the $\eta\theta\omega\eta$. The other two parts, $\pi \epsilon \rho i \pi \epsilon \tau e \alpha$, and $\alpha \nu \alpha \gamma \nu \omega \rho i \sigma i \varsigma$, denominate one species from their presence, (the $\pi \epsilon \pi \lambda \epsilon \gamma \mu \epsilon \nu \eta$,) and another, (the $\alpha \pi \lambda \eta$,) from their absence.

^{*} Of the first, Mr. Harris gives Measure for Measure as an instance; of the last, Cato.—Philol. Inq. p. 161.—But Cato seems rather a compound of the two species. Dr. Johnson, in his life of Addison, has more justly characterized it by—" just sentiments in clegant language."

¹ See cap. xiv. Transl. Part II. Sect. 13.

N O T E 151.

P. 100. ANOTHER, THE MORAL.

Ηθικη.—" Videant studiosi hujus libri, an intelligi debeant, et " tanquam ἀπο κοινε repeti, et hic et infra, verba illa quæ in explicatione fabulæ implexæ posuit: intelligo, inquam, hæc—ής το όλον " ἐςω: et quod præterea utroque loco convenit, inde sumptum, " [i. e. $\pi\alpha\theta$ ®— ήθ®] ut, quemadmodum inquit in describendâ illâ " perplexâ—ής το όλον ἐςι περιπετεια και ἀναγνωρισις,—ita, in patheticâ, " — ής το όλον ἐςι παθη; et in moratâ, ής το όλον ἐςιν ήθη." So Victorius; and the observation seems just and important.

By $\hat{\eta}\theta m\eta$, I cannot think, that the mere absence of $\pi\alpha\theta\eta$ is meant, as M. Batteux supposes a, or, as Dacier and others take it, the mere moral tendency of the example. I understand the $\tau_{\theta}\alpha\gamma\omega\delta\alpha$ $\hat{\eta}\theta m\eta$ to be, in the most obvious and usual sense of the word, that kind of Tragedy, $\hat{\eta}_{5}$ to $\hat{\delta}\lambda\omega$ $\hat{\epsilon}_{5}m$ $\hat{\eta}\theta\eta$ —of which the manners are the predominant part; which seems sufficiently to imply the absence of that violent perturbation, deep distress, and terrible catastrophe, which distinguish the pathetic species. This obvious sense of $\hat{\eta}\theta m\eta$ is confirmed by Aristotle's exemplification in cap. xxiv. For there, he plainly opposes it to the $\pi\alpha\theta\eta\tau m\omega v$ of the Iliad, and applies it to the Odyssey; a poem eminently characterized as a picture of life and manners. The word is also used, evidently, in the same sense in the Rhetoric; where the two species of the drama, $\hat{\eta}\theta m\omega v$, and $\pi\alpha\theta\eta\tau$.

[&]quot; La fable morale, opposée à la Pathetique, doit être celle où il n' y a point de sang repandu; telles sont le Cinna de Corneille, et la Berenice de Racine."—Principez de la Lit. iii. p. 85.

b See Longinus, Sect. 9, ad finem.

action, are mentioned, as being, each of them, accommodated to action, and preferred, on that account, by the players, as peculiarly favourable to the display of their mimetic powers. Now this would not be the case, if by ηθικη nothing more than a moral lesson and a virtuous example were intended. Yet this idea is by no means excluded by the other; and Victorius seems to have rightly adjusted this matter. "Animadvertendum autem Tragædiam illam "vocari moratam, quæ non folum accurate mores exprimit, sed eos "etiam inducit probos; quod ipse significavit suprà, ubi de moribus "disseruit; primum enim præcepit ut χρησω ηθη singerentur."

If it be objected, that, the delineation of manners being the peculiar province of Comedy, this account of the Τραγφδια ήθωνη confounds the limits of these two opposite species of the drama; we may answer, that the moral, or rather mannered Tragedy, (for we feem to want a word here,) though allowed by Aristotle, was certainly not that which he himself considered as the best, or the most Tragic d: yet, that even this was fufficiently diffinguished from Comedy by the kind of manners which it imitated. to be, if possible, good, $(\chi_0\eta_5\alpha_5)$ —at all events they were to be, on the whole, ferious—onedaix: whereas the object of Comedy, with respect to manners, as to every thing else, was the ridiculous. We must remember too, that, as I have before observed, the two dramas were by no means, in Aristotle's time, so rigorously separated as they now are. There were, then, but two dramatic muses, the muse of Tragedy, and the muse of Farce. Yet there is something between a flood of tears and a broad laugh; and as Farce obstinately refused to put any degree of restraint upon her muscles, Tragedy, who, as we have feen, was fo accommodating, as even, occasionally, to approach to the very laugh of Farce, frequently ⁻ άγωνιςτικη δε, [fc. λεξις—oratorical diction] ή ύποκριτικωτατη· ταυτης δε δυο είδη· ή μεν γαρ, ΗΘΙΚΗ, ή δε, ΠΑΘΗΤΙΚΗ. διο και δι ύποκριται τα ΤΟΙΑΥΤΑ ΤΩΝ ΔΡΑΜΑΤΩΝ διωκεσι, και δι ποιηται τες τοιετες. [fc. ύποκριτας.] Rhet. ΗΙ. 12.

⁴ See cap. xiii. Transl. Part II. Sect. 12.

condescended to dry her tears, and to put on, without scruple, the intermediate smile, which Comedy should have supplied.

N O T E 152.

P. 100. And, FOURTHLY, THE SIMPLE, SUCH AS----AND ALL THOSE TRAGEDIES, THE SCENE OF WHICH IS LAID IN THE INFERNAL REGIONS.

Το δε τεταρτον, διον, άιτε Φορκιδες, και Προμηθευς, και όσα εν άδε— The enumeration of these species in cap. xxiv. leaves no room to doubt the omission of the word AΠΛΟΥΝ here. Το δε τεταρτον, άπλεν, διον, &c.

The commentators have been much puzzled to discover, why all those Tragedies, that have for their subject ra en ale, should be of the fimple construction; and I have, indeed, been sometimes strongly inclined to believe, that the words, Rai oa in ade, were out of their place, and belonged to the second species; thus: ή δε Παθητικη, διον, δι τε Λιαντες, και οι Ιζιονες, και όσα έν άδε. Why fuch subjects should belong to the disastrous class, no one can want a reason; and the words follow naturally, and pertinently, in this view, after the instance of Ixion. I have been surprised not to find so obvious a conjecture in any of the comments. Piccolomini, indeed, glances at it:-" Non so vedere, perchè più tosto in essempio delle Tra-" gedie pathetiche, che delle femplici, non le habbia poste; ha-"vendo riguardo in ciò alle punition, e supplicii dell' inferno." p. 255. And it is very fingular, that Dacier's note (N° 10.) is exactly fuch, as if he had himself made this conjecture; of which, however, he fays hothing. But, after all, it is obvious enough, as Beni has observed, that, in these insernal Tragedies, no megimeralia, no fudden reverse of circumstances, could well have place. The comment of that acute Italian upon this passage, is the best I have feen, and will, perhaps, fatisfy the reader, that no fuch conjecture is 3 F wanted.—" Clausula hæc sit;—ex istius modi sabulis exemplum " duxisse Aristotelem ad illustrandam simplicem sabulam, quòd cum " illi [sc. Tantalus, Sisyphus, &c.] in eas pænas atque tormenta, " non à prosperitate, quemadmodum Oedipus et alii plerique, " devolverentur, sed ab initio ad finem usque illis jactarentur, " peripetia aberat quèm longissimè. Imò verò, non modò repentè " fortunæ commutatio haud siebat, quod est proprium peripetiæ, " verum etiam mutatio in decursu toto siebat levissima ac propè nulla; " ita ut ab initio ad finem usque, mira simplicitate slueret sabula. " Ex quo siebat, ut commodiùs ex aliis, in quibus repentè vulnera, " cruciatus, et cædes contingebant, patheticæ duceretur exemplum, " quàm ex iis, quibus nullus repentè cruciatus insligebatur, et tamen simplicitas de quâ dicebam mirisicè apparebat."—Benii Comment. P. 372.

As to the reading itself, ev áde, it seems to be sufficiently confirmed even by a collation of blunders; for the MSS. exhibit, ev à dou-ev à dou-eve à d Victorius seems to doubt, I know not why, whether there existed any such Tragedies. The Σισυφ Πετροπυλιςης of Æschylus must, clearly, have been of this kind; and probably his Ψυχαγωγοι. His Prometheus may be conceived to come the nearest of any Greek Tragedy extant to a specimen of this kind of drama.—Dacier has very properly reminded us here of what Aristotle had said, cap. xiii. of the old Poets—that τες τυχοντας μυθες ἀπηριθμεν—i. e. they took, as we say, any subject that came uppermost.

N O T E 153.

P. 102. BUT IN THE DRAMA, THE EFFECT OF SUCH A PLAN IS FAR DIFFERENT FROM WHAT IS EXPECTED.

Πολυ παρα την υποληψιν ἀποβαινα:—literally, "it turns out very if differently from what was expected, or supposed, by the Poet."

The υποληψε, the view, and expectation of the Poet, when he crowds fo many incidents into his piece, is, that he shall make it interesting and pleasing by its variety. But the contrary happens. The necessity of not exceeding the usual length, and time of reprefentation, reduces the proposed variety to a confused and huddled mass of incidents, not long enough dwelt on, or sufficiently detailed, to be either interesting, or clear. His Poem will be ματαπεπλεγμενον τη ποικιλια, as the critic well expresses it in another passage that should be compared with this'. Thus, the Poet, in this ill-judged attempt, is disappointed in the same manner as the architect, who aims at a beautiful variety by a multitude of small and crowded ornaments, which spoil the general effect, and, at the fame time, are too many, and too minute, to afford pleafure by separate inspection. And thus, πολυ παρα την υποληψω αποβαωει; or, as the ingenious author of the Analysis of Beauty has expressed the same idea, in a chapter which affords no bad illustration of this passage from a sister art, "variety, when overdone, is a check " upon itself "."

Such appears to me to be the meaning of this passage, which, I think, has not been fully seen by any of the commentators.

^a Cop. xxiii. Transl. Part III. Soct. 1. " perplexed by its variety."

b Hogarth's Anal. of Beauty, cap. viii.—a work, to which, with all its imperfections, I think it may fairly be faid, that the public have not done full justice; perhaps, through the author's own fault, who did it more than justice himself, by his pretentions. When Hogarth attempted to philosophize, he was lost. His meaning is often obscured by awkward expression, and sometimes seems, pretty plainly, not to have been well known even to himself. (See particularly his chap. on Proportion.) Yet the book abounds, I think, with sensible, useful, and, at the time it was written, I believe, uncommon, observations. The ideas of eminent artists, relative to their own arts, must always be, more or less, valuable and useful; and they ought not to be discouraged from communicating those ideas to the public, by criticism too severely exercised upon the manner in which they do it. A few ideas, even roughly thrown out, from an artist of genius, will often be of more utility to the progress of the art, than whole pages of fine writing and refined speculation from the unpractised amateur.

N O T E 154.

P. 102. As Euripides, But not Æschylus, has done, &c.

This passage affords a good specimen of the distressing ambiguity that prevails fo remarkably throughout this work. It fairly adrnits of two different constructions, and two different senses. It may be thus: όσοι περσιν Ιλικ όλην έποιησαν και μη κατα μερ. (ώσπερ Ευριπ.δης Νιοβην, η Μηδειαν, και μη ώσπερ Αισχυλώ,) η εκπιπτυσινκ. τ. αλ. Or thus: όσοι περσιν Ιλικ όλην εποιησαν,—και μη κατα μερος (ώσπερ Ευρ. Ν. η Μ. [sc. κατα μερω εποιησε,] και μη ώσπερ Αισχ. [sc. έλην εποιησε.]) ή εκπιπ. n. τ. αλ.—In the first of these ways, the cenfure will fall on Euripides; in the other, on Æschylus. Victorius contends for the first, but his reasons, though plausible, seem not decifive. The whole, as he observes, turns upon this-whether the ώσπερ refers to the whole fentence—όλην εποιησαν και μη κατα μερ©,—or, only to the words immediately preceding, i. e. κατα μερ. On the whole, the last construction, I think, offers itself most naturally; and it seems rather favoured, too, by the similar application of μη ώσπερ, to the Poet confured, presently after; where, speaking of the Chorus, he says it should συναγωνίζεσθαι, ΜΗ ΏΣΠΕΡ παρ' Ευριπιδη, άλλ' ΩΣΠΕΡ παρα Σοφοκλει.—But this, after all, is one of those passages, where the "aquato examine lances" are so nicely balanced, that a commentator might continue in suspence for ever, if the necessity of going on did not oblige him to turn the fcale by a touch of his own hand.

^{*} Dacier's interpretation (note 19.) I pass over as perfectly inadmissible. This torced construction he borrowed from Castelvetro, p. 308.

N O T E 155.

P. 102. For, in revolutions, and in actions of the simple kind, these Poets succeed wonderfully in what they aim at; and that is, the union of tragic effect with moral tendency, &c.

Those annotators who make the words, Έν δε ταις περιπετειαις—the beginning of a separate precept relative to the use of the wonderful, have the natural construction of the text, and the uniform reading of all the MSS. against them. The natural and obvious construction, surely, is, ἐν τετφ μονφ' ἐν ΔΕ ταις περ.—κ. τ. αλ. And this is also confirmed by the mention of Agatho again, presently afterwards. All the MSS. too, it seems, give θαυμαςως, which can never be forced into the sense of "per admirabile"." The alteration proposed by Heinsius—στοχαζεται, and βελεται—in order to make this refer exclusively to Agatho, seems unnecessary. Στοχαζονται refers, very naturally, to Agatho in conjunction with the other Poets just mentioned, whose mistake, and whose failure, were the same.

I have ventured to render this passage in a manner somewhat different from any translator or commentator that I have seen b. Τραγικου γας τετο, και φιλαυθρωπου. The question is, to what τετο refers? The commentators are divided. It appears to me, that it refers to the purfose, at which these Poets are said to have aimed; and the τετο, which follows, explains the τραγικου και φιλαυθρωπου.—Τετο ΓΑΡ—" for this (i. e. which they aim at,) is both Tragic and Moral." The reader will see how exactly what b The best comment is that of Benius, p. 379.

² Yet so Mr. Winstanley seems to understand it. See his note, p. 294. If there are any examples of the adverb θαυμασως so used, I could wish he had produced them.

follows fuits this fense; and how this passage helps to confirm the sense given to the word φιλανδρωπου, in cap. xiii. [See NOTE 94.] where, Exerior Ras Goldspor, is plainly equivalent to received here. The difficulty was, to reconcile these two effects. Aristotle's expression, στοχαζονται ΘΑΥΜΑΣΤΩΣ — "furprisingly "well" - implies this difficulty, and, that he does not fpeak of the practice as perfectly agreeable to his own theory of the Tragic drama. - In the subjects here instanced, there was the φιλανθρωπου, because the άδικια and πουηρία were punished: and, at the fame time, the Tearing, though not amounting to what the critic required, was not wanting, because there was the unexpected reverse of fortune, a calamitous event, $\pi \alpha \theta \eta$, &c. persons suffering, too, were distinguished by eminent wisdom and courage; and though such characters are not what Aristotle recommends as the fittest for Tragic purposes , yet, by the substitution of admirable and splendid, for moral and estimable, qualities, they are made to produce, in some degree, a similar effect upon the fpestator.

This appears to me to be the fense of the passage; and it leads me strongly to suspect, that, instead of εν τοις ΑΠΛΟΙΣ πραγμασι, we should read—εν τοις ΔΙΠΛΟΙΣ πρ. How easily the mistake might happen, is obvious to the eye. My reasons are these: 1. The αιλανθρωπον—moral tendency—poetical justice, &c. was the very characteristic of the double sable, (διπλη συςασις) and the very reason, probably, why the Platonic critics, as well as the goodnatured audiences, preserved it as the best plans. 2. The instances here given seem to accord exactly with this idea. They are plainly examples of the διπλη συςασις, not of the simple sable—i. e. the sable without revolution or discovery. The expression, τραγικον ^{*} ἐ τραγινον, ΑΠΑΘΕΣ γας, cap. xiv. " not Tragic, because it exhibits no disastrous " event." Transl. Part H. Sect. 14.

⁴ See cap. xiii. ὁ μεταξυ, &c. Tranfl. Part II. Scot. rr.

^{*} See cap. xiii. Tranfl. Part II. Se&t. 12. last parag.

γαρ τετο και φιλανθρωπον, implies, that the Tragic and Moral were aimed at, and effected, by these Poets, both in the περιπετειαι, and in the other actions mentioned, whatever they were—εν τοις περιπ. και εν τοις πραγμασι: and, consequently, his subsequent examples of the τραγικον και φιλανθρωπον must equally accord with both. But, if we read ἀπλοις, this will not be the case; for those examples are such as necessarily imply revolutions, and a sudden and unexpected turn of events, which suit very well with ΔΙΠΛΟΙΣ πραγμασι, but are incompatible with ἀπλοις; the simple sable being defined by this very circumstance, that it is ανευ περιπετειας, &c. (cap. x.)

N O T E 156.

P. 102. Such events, as Agatho says, &c.

This alludes to these two lines of Agatho:

Ταχ' ἀν τις ἐικ. ἀυτο τετ' ἐιναι λεγοι, Βροτοισι πολλα τυγχανειν ἐκ ἐικοτα.

Even this, it may be faid, is probable,
That many things improbable should happen,
In human life.—

See Rhet. II. 24, p. 581, ed. Duval.—And Bayle's Art. AGATHON, note [F], who mentions a fimilar maxim of St. Bernard's: "Ordinatifimum est, minus interdum ordinate fieri." "Il est tout à fait de l'ordre, que de tems en tems il se fasse quelque "chose contre l'ordre."

This general, and, if I may call it so, possible fort of probability, may be termed, the probability of romance; and these lines of Agatho furnish a good apologetical motto for the novel writer. It might be prefixed, perhaps, without impropriety, even to the best productions of the kind—to a CLARISSA, or a CECILIA. Nothing is so commonly complained of in such works, as their improbability; and often, no doubt, the complaint is well founded: often, however, the criticism means nothing more, than that the events are uncommon, and proves nothing more, than the want of sancy, and an extended view of human life, in the reader. If the events were not uncommon, where would the book find readers?

"Si la nature ne combinoit jamais des evenemens d'une ma"niere extraordinaire, tout ce que le Poete imagineroit au-delà de "la fimple et froide uniformité des choses communes, seroit in"croyable. Mais il n'en est pas ainsi. Que fait donc le Poete?
"—Ou il s'empare de ces combinaisons extraordinaires, ou il en
"imagine de semblables. Mais au lieu que la liaison des événe"mens nous échappe souvent dans la nature, et que, saute de con"noitre l'ensemble des choses, nous ne voyons qu'une concomi"tance fatale dans les saits; le Poet veut lui qu'il regne dans toute
"la texture de son ouvrage une liaison apparente et sensible; en
"sorte qu'il est moins vrai, et plus vraisemblable que l'historien."— Diderot, De la Poes. Dram. at the end of his Pere de Famille,
p. 306.

N O T E 157.

P. 102. The Chorus should be considered as one of the persons in the Drama—And a sharer in the action.

This is not, I think, contradicted, but only properly limited and explained, by what the author fays elsewhere—that, to all, is, in direct comparing the chorus with the performs of the drama. In that view, the Chorus might be faid, comparatively, to have no share in the allien.—But here, he is comparing those Choruses whose songs are properly connected with the action, and who are interested in its event, with such as appear to have no concern with it, and to be, not merely inactive, but indifferent, spectators. In this view, it was as natural to say—the Chorus should be regarded as a person of the drama, and a sharer in the action: a sharer, that is, not by the active part, but by the warm interest, which it takes, and expresses, in that action. However, the word arguers must not be taken in its strictest sense. We find the Chorus, in the Greek Tragedies, frequently contributing, in some little degree, to the progress of the action, by active offices of friendly attention and assistance; as, for example, in the Philostetes, and the Ajan of Sophocles.

N O T E 158.

P. 103. THEIR CHORAL SONGS, &c.

There cannot, furely, be the least doubt, that, for AIAOMENA, we should read, ALAOMENA: an emendation fo obvious, that it occurred to me the first time I ever read the passage. But I afterwards found, that it had occurred, long ago, to Madius; a circumstance, which, to my great astonishment, has been passed over in utter filence by all the fubsequent commentators that I have feen. The words of Madius are - " Mendum igitur in " verbis omnino esse censeo; ac primum in voce διδομενα, quæ in " locum vocis adomeva irrep/it: nam verbum adem, quod paulò post " ponitur, aperte indicat, locum, ut nos fecimus, castigandum."— I can attribute it only to some inadvertence, or mistake, that Mr. Winstanley, in his note, p. 294, has omitted to take notice of this most material part of Madius's comment on the passage. The emendation is confirmed by the adeas, and adeas, which follow; by the extreme facility of the mistake, and by the difficulty of giving any reasonable explanation of the other reading. Aidomera, says Victorius, "quia magistratus eos (sc. choros) dabat." But he agrees that $\mu \in \lambda \eta$ is understood; and though we read, often, of the magistrate's giving a Chorus, (devas $\chi \circ \varphi \circ v$,) that is, furnishing the expence of the choral dresses, &c. we no where read, I believe, of their giving the Choral Odes.

N O T E 159.

P. 103. BUT IT IS EVIDENT, THAT, WITH RESPECT TO THE THINGS THEMSELVES ALSO, &c.

Και έν τοις πραγμασιν. The alteration of Heinfius, δραμασιν, appears to me, not only to be unnecessary, but to pervert Aristotle's meaning. Τα πραγματα, here, are, I think, the things themselves the circumstances and incidents of the action or fable, as opposed to Διανοια, the fentiments, or thoughts, and to όσα ύπο τε ΛΟΓΟΥ κ. τ. αλ. He had referred to the rhetorical treatifes for what concerns the διανοια; he goes on, (after a short explanation of διανοια and its various branches,)—" But it is plain, that, not only " for the διανεια, or fentiments, but also for the things themselves, " (KAI εν τοις πραγμασιν,) how they are to be made terrible, pitcous, " &c. the Poet should draw from the same sources, and may be "referred to the same treatises." - Thus, for example, in the fecond book of Aristotle's Rhetoric, he may learn what fort of things, perfons, and events, are proper to raise terror, or pity*, the peculiar objects of Tragic imitation. After which observation, he goes on, very naturally and properly, to remark, as Dacier has well observed, " la différence entre les choses que traitent les Ora-" teurs, et celles que traitent les Poetes."-For the rest, my idea of this passage accords with that of Dacier, (note 3); but he does not appear to have feen the force of the expression, KAI έν τοις πραγ. Indeed, he entirely drops the conjunction, which is here of great importance; for it feems to fix the fense of πραγμασιν, and to point its opposition to διανοια:—Τα μεν εν περι την ΔΙΑΝΟΙΑΝ έν τοις ξητ. κεισθω• — - δηλον δε, ότι ΚΑΙ έν τοις ΠΡΑΓΜΑΣΙΝ ἀπο των αυτων είδων δει χρησθαι—.

² See particularly cap. v. and viii, ed. Duval.

In Goulston's version, which follows Castelvetro, this opposition is rightly expressed; but in what follows, Aristotle's meaning is, I think, mistaken: for the difference he is shewing, $(\pi\lambda\eta\nu)$ tocatous $\delta\iota\alpha\varphi\epsilon\varrho\alpha$, &c.) is not, I apprehend, the difference between the things and the fentiments, in Tragedy, but, between the things themselves only, considered in different views, as the subject of the Orator, or of the Poet.—These commentators understand the expressions, in $\tau\omega$ $\lambda \circ \gamma \omega$, and, $\tau \circ \lambda \circ \gamma \circ \tau \circ \omega$, of the dramatic speech, and speaker.

N O T E 160.

P. 103. MUST DRAW FROM THE SAME SOURCES ---

—Απο των ἀυτων ἐιδων δει χρησθαι.—The expression, χρησθαι ΑΠΟ, is, I believe, uncommon. It seems rightly explained by Victorius "—to borrow from:"—" quasi utendum illinc sumere atque mutuari."

N O T E 161.

P. 103. WITHOUT BEING SHEWN TO BE SUCH.-

— Ανευ διδασκαλιας. "Senza che si dica e che s'insegni che sian "tali."—Piccolomini:—I believe, very exactly. The reader may compare Rhet. I. 2. p. 514, B.—and III. 1. p. 584, B. and, (διδασκαλικη,) I. 2. p. 515, A.

The truth of what the philosopher here observes, may appear from this single consideration. Suppose two Tragedies written by two Poets on the same subject, and of which the plot and principal incidents are the same 2: and suppose two pleadings of the same cause, by two speakers. It seems very plain, that the difference of the effect upon an audience in the former case, would bear much less proportion to the difference between the Poets, than it would, in the other case, to the difference between the Speakers.

3 G 2

N O T E 162.

P. 104. If they already appear so in themselves.

-Ει φαινοιτο ήδεα. - That ήδεα is wrong, I have no doubt. if we admit it, we must take it, as Victorius does, for a single instance; as if Aristotle had said, "aut jucundæ, aut tristes, aut "atroces, &c.--: quamvis enim nunc unum horum ponat, i. e. " jucunda, reliqua tamen audienda funt."—But how improbable it is, that he should not chuse his single instance, if he meant to give one, out of those which had just been mentioned?—that he should not rather have faid, ει φαινοιτο έλεεινα, or δεινα, than ήδεα, jucunda; which, besides, is evidently not at all to his purpose. I cannot, therefore, help thinking it fomething more than probable, that Aristotle wrote this, φαινοιτο Η.ΔΗ [sc. τοιαυτα—that is, ελεεινα, δεινα, &c.)—" If they appear already so;—in themselves." The elliptic brevity of the expression will hardly be objected to, in a writer who abounds with instances much more harsh and obscure than this. In the same manner, τοιαυτα is understood with φαινεσθαι just before: - τα μεν δει φαινεσθαι (sc. τοιαυτα) άνευ διδασκαλιας.

The fame conjecture had, I find, occurred, long ago, to Caftelvetro, but, which I think fomewhat fingular, has not been taken

^{*} For example, the Merope of Voltaire, and that of Aaron Hill. As feems, there can be no comparison between these two productions. But I doubt whether, in both, the same false has not always produced much the same effect upon the audience. This shows the truth and propriety of the rank which Aristotle assigns to the false, as the "foul of Tragedy."

notice of by any of the commentators I have seen. He says—" ε΄ φαινοιτο ήδεα: coloro, li quali non riconoscono che qui sia errore, "assegnino à queste parole, se possiono, senso degno e conveniento "ad Aristotele. Adunque io crederei che non sosse male à leg- gere ήδη, in luogo d'ήδεα, e'l senso sarebbe convenevole." [p. 406.]

The reader may fee a very different explanation of this whole passage in the Abbé Batteux's notes; but an explanation which cannot, in my opinion, be reconciled to the text. His censure of Dacier and others, that they have rendered this chapter "à con- tresens," seems to me to recoil upon himself.

N O T E 163.

P. 104. FIGURES OF SPEECH-.

—Τα σχηματα της λέξεως—. Dacier, Batteux, and indeed almost all the commentators, seem to take σχηματα, here, for the gestures, modifications of countenance, and tones of voice, that accompany speech*. But, first, I much doubt whether the Greek will fairly admit of such a sense. Aristotle says, σχηματα ΛΕΞΕΩΣ, sigures, or forms, of the speech itself, not of the speaker. The same expression occurs several times in the Rhetoric, and always means the form of the diction itself; never the gesture with which it is delivered —2. Aristotle explains himself by—διον, ΤΙ εντολη και ΤΙ ενχη, &c. i. e. what they are, not, what action or tone of voice they require b; "avec quel ton et quel geste on ordonne," as M. Batteux unwarrantably translates it.—3. Aristotle says, that no blame, or none worth regarding, (αξιον σπεδης,) can fall upon the Poetry, (εις την ποιητιαην,) in consequence of the Poet's ignorance of these matters, or of his not knowing them technically. A remark, surely, very unnecessary, if mere action and pronunciation were intended by σχηματα.—But, 4. The thing seems evident from the instance given of a criticism of this kind. Protagoras plainly charged Homer with ignorance, or inaccuracy, with respect to these σχηματα λεξεως, whatever they were. Now, according to the common explanation, the criticism could fall only on Homer's pronunciation or action: but, of this, Protagoras knew nothing; all he appears to have meant, is, that Homer had made an improper use of the imperative mood; that is, had used one σχημα λεξεως, where he should have used another.

^{* &}quot;Σχηματα vocat habitus quosdam, conformationesque oris, frontis, oculorum, vultus, gesticulationis manuum," &c. Robortelli, p. 227.

^{*} Rhet. II. 24, p. 579. III. 8, p. 591, B. and 10, p. 594, B.—And De Soph. Elench. p. 284, D.

^b Had this been his meaning, he would rather have faid τ_i ΕΝΤΟΛΗΣ $-\tau_i$ ΕΥΧΗΣ," &c.

But what, then, are we to understand by these σχηματα λέζεως? -The learned reader will immediately fee, that, as Victorius has observed, they are not to be confounded with those σχηματα λεξεως, of which we hear fo much from Cicero, Quintilian, Dion. Hal. &c.—those "figuræ verborum," which are opposed to the σχηματα διανοιας, the "figuræ mentis, sententiarum," &c. Indeed, no such divition of σχηματα is, I believe, to be found in Aristotle. It seems to have been the invention of the later Rhetoricians; and how little they were agreed, as to the number and the species of these σχηματα, the propriety of the division itself, and even the precise sense of the word σχημα, may be seen in Quintilian IX. 1.— The σχηματα λεξεως of Aristotle, in this place, are plainly such, as would have been denominated by later writers, σχηματα διανοιας figures of the thought or sense. Indeed we find them actually enumerated among the figures of that class. See Dionys. Halicarn. de Struct. &c. Sect. 8.—So Quintilian; "Figuras quoque mentis, " qua oxquara bareias dicuntur, res eadem recipit omnes, in quas " nonnulli diviserunt species dictorum, (i. e. of jokes, bons mots.) " Nam

" Nam et interrogamus, et dubitamus, et affirmamus, et minamur, " et optamus."

I fee, therefore, not the least reason, why the expression $\sigma_{\chi\eta\mu\alpha}$ refers should not be rendered here, exactly as in the other passages above referred to, "figura orationis"—form, or consiguration, of "fpeech. For refig, it must be observed, is here used, not in the particular sense of distion, or style and manner of expression, (as it is used Rbet. III. 8.) but in the general sense of $\lambda \circ \gamma \gg$, speech, as we find it used in the beginning of the next chapter.

But though I cannot admit, that σχηματα means " configura-"tiones oris," &c. or, should be so rendered, yet I certainly admit, that Aristotle appears plainly to consider these different forms of fpeech, or fentences, with a view to action, or delivery; and, poffibly, the observation of Victorius may be well founded, that-"vocatæ hæ figuræ ita videntur, quia aliter atque aliter vultus, "totumque corpus, cum cariantur illa, conformantur; ut meritò "hâc de causa, σχηματα, figuræ, ipsæ appellatæ fint."—I find the fame thing in the following passage of Aristides Quintilianus, which feems evidently to allude to this very part of Aristotle's treatife, and may be thought to afford some illustration. — Hequ de this two ΣΧΗΜΑΤΩΝ φυσεως, δις προσαγείν χρη τα νοηματα, ε πολλα λεγείν δείν ήγομαι. ΊΚΑΝΗ ΓΑΡ Ἡ ὙΠΟΚΡΙΣΙΣ ΤΑΥΤΑ ΔΗΛΩΣΑΙ. Και γαρ τυτων έκαςον (i. e. each of these σχηματα διανοιας, οτ νοηματων,) η συς ελλει πως, ώς άι παραιτησεις, ή άνιησιν, ώς άι συγχωρησεις, την διανοιαν και ήτοι μικροπρεπεις, ώς άι διορθωσεις, ή μεγαλειες, ώς άι γνωμολογιαι και άφηγησεις, άπεργαζονται. ών έκας ετην ένεργεικό ΕΚ ΤΩΝ ΤΥΠΩΝ APIΣΤ' AN ΔΙΑΓΝΟΙΗΜΕΝ, 'ΩΝ [leg. forte 'ΟΥΣ] ΈΚΑΣΤΟΝ, ΚΑΤΑ ΤΟΝ ΤΗΣ ΥΠΟΚΡΙΣΕΩΣ ΚΑΙΡΟΝ, ΤΟΙΣ ΣΩΜΑΣΙΝ ΕΝ-ΤΙΘΗΣΙ· ΠΑΡ' Ό ΚΑΙ ΣΧΗΜΑΣΙΝ ΑΥΤΟΙΣ ΣΥΝΕΒΗ ΚΑΗΘΗΝΑΙ ..

I rather suspect, we should read spoatesin, in the beginning of this passage; in the sense of ensemble passage, ensemble passage. Meibomius c De Instit. Or. VI. 3. p. 316. ed. Gibs.

Aristid. Quintil. " De Musica," p. 86, ed. Meibonii.

renders σχηματων, "gefluum," which cannot be the meaning; for by the τετων εκαςον, and the exemplification which follows, (παραιτησεις, συγχωρησεις, &c.), and, indeed, by all the rest of the passage, it is clear, that he speaks of the configurations of the speech or sentence, of which he goes on to describe the different effects, first on the mind, and, ultimately, on the action, of the speaker. The version should, therefore, have been thus:—"De figurarum natura" quibus animi notiones proferendæ," &c. Or, is προταγείν be right, the meaning, I think, must be—" to which those νοηματα" are to be referred—under which they are to be classed." See the passage above, from Quintilian, and that of Dion. Hal. Sect. 8. which is much to the purpose.

Why Aristotle should dismiss this subject, as of much more concern, to the Actor, than to the Poet, requires no explanation. There could scarce, indeed, be any other occasion for the study of these σχηματα, but in order to learn, or to teach, in what manner, with what variations of tone, countenance, and gesture, propriety required them to be pronounced.—At the same time, it will not appear strange that he should mention them, if we recollect, that the Poets themselves were, at first, actors also, in their own pieces, and, afterwards, no doubt, instructed their actors; and hence perhaps, after all—not, as is commonly understood, from the moral teaching of the drama itself —the well known phrases, διδασμείν τραγωδιών, docere fabulam, &cc. may, most naturally, be accounted for.

Nor was this practice peculiar to antient times. We know with what eagerness and animation Voltaire taught his Tragedies, almost to his latest hour. During his last visit to Paris, where he died, "Il n'y vit rien, ne songea à y rien voir; il n'y vécut que "pour des Comediens, qu'il fatiguoit, en voulant leur denner des leçons de declamation"."

NOTE

^{*} Sec Casaub. in Athen. p. 413. and De Satyr. Poef. p. 113.

^{*} Tableau de Paris, tome viii. p. 20.—Since this note was written, I have had the futisfaction

N.O T E 164.

P. 104. THE PROFESSED MASTERS OF THAT KIND ---

—Τε την τοιαυτην έχουτ APXITEKTONIKHN.—For this word, fee Eth. Nicom. I. 1, 2.—Thus, here, it feems to mean that mafter art, which teaches the principles of elocution, the art of public speaking, in general.

N O T E 165.

P. 104. THE CAVIL OF PROTAGORAS -----

See Hermes, I. 8, p. 144.

This, it seems, was his usual style of criticism; for, διανοιαν άρεις, προς τ'ενομα διελεχθη, as Diog. Laertius says of him a . He seems, indeed, to have been the inventor of these σχηματα λεξεως. At least the same writer says, διειλε τον λογον ΠΡΩΤΟΣ εις τεσσαρα ΈΥΧΩΛΗΝ, ΈΡΩΤΗΣΙΝ, ΑΠΟΚΡΙΣΙΝ, ΈΝΤΟΛΗΝ (δι δε, εις έπτακι. τ. αλ.) ές και πυθμενας ειπε λογων:—" the foundations of speech."

There is something amusing in the history of this man. He was originally a porter; and might have continued so, if his extraordinary genius for tying up wood had not attracted the notice of Democritus, by whose instructions and encouragement, from an eminent porter, he became as eminent a sophist. The reader fatisfaction to find the above explanation of the phrase δίδασμειν τραγγόλαν, &c. supported by Heyne: "Διδασκαλ. est poeta, qui fabulam committit, in theatrum producit; quia cam actores docet."—In Epicteti Enchir. cap. xvii.

² IX. 52. ed. Meib.

b IX. 54.—See Hermes, as above, about the different species of sentences; and ch. ii.

may fee the story in Aulus Gellius, V. 3.—The public was, certainly, not much obliged to Democritus. Protagoras was of more use to mankind when he invented porter's knots^c, than when he invented the $\sigma_{\chi\eta\mu\alpha\tau\alpha}$ $\lambda_{\epsilon}\xi_{\epsilon\omega\zeta}$, and undertook to teach, at the price of a bundred minæ⁴, the art of Belial—

" to make the worfe
"Appear the better reason:"——

— τον ήττον λογον κρειττον ποιειν .

"If a cobler," fays Socrates in the Meno of Plato, " or a taylor, "fhould return the shoes, or the clothes, he undertook to mend, in a worse condition than that, in which he received them, he would foon lose his business, and be starved for want of work. But it is not so with the sophists. Protagoras was able to carry on, for forty years together, without detection, and with great credit, the trade of spoiling all those who became his disciples, and fending them back much worse than he found them."

N O T E 166.

P. 104. To ALL DICTION BELONG, &c.

See Diss. I. p. 37.—After having discussed three of the constituent parts of Tragedy, the sable, the manners, and the sentiments, Aristotle now comes to the distion ($\Lambda \in \mathcal{E}_{15}$), upon which he bestows three chapters. His subject plainly required him to speak of the $^{^{\}circ}$ — την καλυμενην ΤΥΛΗΝ, έφ' ής τα φορτία βαςαζυσι, έυρεν, ώς φησίν Αρισοτελης. D. Laert. IX. 53.

d Above £. 300.—D. Laert. ibid. and Suidas. Aristotle, however, gives a different account of the way in which he was paid, Ethic. Nicom. IX. 1.

e See Rhet. II. 24, p. 581, D.

⁵ Ed. Serr. tom. ii. p. 91.

diction of Tragedy, not of poetic diction in general; much less, to descend to the grammatical elements of language in general. Yet, of his three chapters on diction, the first is merely grammatical, and such, as even in a rhetorical treatise would appear misplaced; and even the two following chapters relate to poetic language in general, without any thing applicable to the diction of Tragedy in particular—his proper subject—except a single observation, or, rather, hint, at the end of the third chapter.

Dacier, who discharged, with as much fidelity as any commentator ever did, the duty of seeing nothing amis in his author, has zealously defended the propriety of this grammatical chapter: but all he says amounts, I think, to little more than this—that the chapter should be there, because it is there. No man is nice about reasons, when the point to be proved has been determined before he looks for them.

N O T E 167.

P. 104. DISCOURSE OR SPEECH ----

NOFOE.—Mr. Harris, in the Hermes, p. 19, has rendered the word, fentence. He took that part of the idea, that fuited his fubject; but, that this is not the whole fense of the word, but only a sense included in the word, is evident from what is said below, in the definition of $\lambda \circ \gamma \otimes$, where the entire Iliad is comprehended under that term. Had I here rendered $\lambda \circ \gamma \otimes$ by sentence, I must, to have been consistent in my translation, have there called the Iliad a sentence.

The word $\lambda \circ \gamma \otimes$ here plainly answers—not to fentence, exclusively, nor yet, exclusively, to what Mr. Harris calls "Oration or [·] See the conclusion of cap. xxii. Περι μεν έν Τραγωδίας, κ. τ. αλ.

See NOTE 209.

"Discourse"," as composed of several sentences; but, it is a general term, comprehending both these, and applicable, like the Latin word oratio, or the English, speech, to every significant combination of words, whether consisting of a single sentence, or of many; as, indeed, appears from Aristotle's definition itself. Nay, the word appears not even to have been limited to a complete affertive sentence; for the philosopher, in the treatise $\pi \epsilon_{ij}$ Equantizes, gives the denomination of $\lambda \sigma_{ij}$ to these two words— $\kappa \alpha \lambda \sigma_{ij}$ in the says, in $\pi \omega$. He says, in $\pi \omega$. It was what he calls a merely significant $\lambda \sigma_{ij} \omega$, as distinguished from an affertive $\lambda \sigma_{ij} \omega$, or proposition, such as, $\kappa \alpha \lambda \omega \omega$ ESTIN in $\pi \omega$.

I was unable to find any English word, that would express λογω adequately, and clearly. And it seems somewhat remarkable, that the Greek language, rich and copious as it is, should not afford—at least I am not aware that it does—any single word perfectly synonymous to our word, sentence. Λογω, as I have observed, is too wide; it serves equally to express a single sentence, or a whole speech, or even less than a sentence. It is applied by Aristotle to a combination of two words—a substantive and an adjective, without a verb—and, to the Iliad. Περιοδω was only one particular kind, or form, of sentence. Κωλον did not necessarily contain a complete sense, or thought, which is essential to our word, sentence.

² Hermes, p. 324.

b See Rhet. III. 9. p. 592.

Demet. de Elec. Sect. 2.

N O T E 168.

P. 105. IN DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE MOUTH-

Toποις.—Clearly right; nor can I conceive, what should have induced any critic to suspect this reading.—See Dionys. Halicarn. Sect. 14.—his curious and accurate analysis of articulation: and Aristides Quintil. p. 89, ed. Meib.—where, in describing the formation of the letters, these expressions occur:—ἐκ των περι τες οδοντας ΤΟΠΩΝ—and, ἐκ μεσε τε φωνητικε ΤΟΠΟΥ. See, also, Hermes, III. 2, p. 322.—ΤΟΝΟΙΣ, which had occurred to Mr. Winstanley*, would be mere tautology; for that idea is fully expressed afterwards, by οξυτητι και βαρυτητι. Thus, Rhet. III. 1. τοις ΤΟΝΟΙΣ, ΌΙΟΝ οξεια και βαρεια, και μεση.

N O T E 169.

P. 105. As THEIR TONE IS ACUTE, GRAVE, OR INTER-

—Οξυτητι, βαρυτητι, και τω μεσω.—All the commentators seem agreed, that by τω μεσω is meant the circumstex. Mr. Foster, in his Essay on Accent, &c. expresses some degree of doubt about this and, I confess, it appears to me to be somewhat more than doubtful. Certainly, the only obvious and proper sense of the word mean, or middle, thus applied to the pitch of sound, is, that which is between ozu and βαρυ; not, that which is compounded of the two, as the circumstex is always represented to be. At least the expression, in this latter sense, would not be very accurate and philosophical. A circumstexed syllable is described to be, a syllable that has both.

^{*} Ed. Ox. 1780, p. 296,

² P. 22.—See the note.

an acute and a grave accent;— ἀμφοτερας τας τασεις, as it is expressed by Dion. Halicarn. Sect. 11. The voice first rises, and then falls, on the same syllable. A man would be thought to speak very strangely, who should describe any object painted half white and half black, by saying, that it was of a colour between black and white.

But, farther, I observe, that in other passages of Aristotle's works, where he fpeaks of accents, the word meson no where occurs. Indeed, he uses neither this, nor any other word, to denote the circumflex accent. He mentions only όξυ, and βαρυ, acute, and grave. See De Soph. Elench. p. 284, C .- 288, E .- 304, A .-306, A. ed. Duval. In the last of these passages especially, his expression is remarkable: ει παρα προσωδιαν όζειαν, 'Η ΒΑΡΕΙΑ προσωδια λυσις ει δε παρα βαρειαν, 'Η ΟΞΕΙΑ. That is—" If the fophism "fupposes the acute accent, the answer is—it is the grave accent; "and vice ver/d." Here are no traces of the triple division of accents, given by later writers, into acute, grave, and circumflex. Nay more; he speaks in the same way, even when the very ambiguity in question lies between an acute, and a circumflex, accent: as, i, (non,) and i (ubi). See the passage, p. 304, A: where the circumflexed is expressed by the word βαρυτερου . — This, I confess, much increases my doubt with respect to the word μεσω in the passage before us. For, had that been Aristotle's term for the circumflex accent, as the common explanation supposes, we probably should have found the expression in some of the passages referred to; at least, in that last mentioned.

I cannot, surely, be misunderstood, as meaning to infer, from these passages, that the slexure itself of the voice upon a single syllable, which was afterwards denominated by Grammarians, περισπωμενη, was unknown to Aristotle and the earlier writers. The thing, undoubtedly, has always existed, and must exist, more or less, in every language. But these passages do, I think, afford a pretty strong presumption, that the circumstex had then no appropriated term, and, consequently, that, in this passage, the word perov has a different, and its usual and proper, meaning; that, in which it is used continually by the writers on Harmonics.

A marginal note in Duval's ed. fays—" Semper enim Aristoteles βαρειαν vocat την περισπαμαετην."

But, farther, it appears to be so used by Aristotle himself, in a fimilar passage of his Rhetoric. In the beginning of the third book, speaking of oratorical action or delivery, (ὑποιρισις) as far as it relates to the voice, he fays, έςι δε άυτη μεν έν τη φωνη, πως άυτη δει χρησθαι προς έκαςον παθιο διον, ποτε μεγαλή, και ποτε μικρά, και ποτε μεση και πως τοις τουοις, διου, όξεια, και βαρεια, και ΜΕΣΗι. Now, even supposing this to relate to accents, it seems, that μεση, here, should naturally have the same meaning, with respect to igeia, and βαρεια, as it has when applied immediately before to μεγαλη and unpa, where it plainly means the medium between loud and foft.— But I think the passage clearly does not relate to the mere fyllabic accent: for he is there professedly speaking of the accommodation of the voice to the expression of different passions; he must therefore mean fuch variation of tone or pitch, as depends upon the speaker's choice; not that of the accentual acuteness and gravity; for this is always spoken of as a fixed and invariable thing . Aristotle therefore means, I believe, exactly what Cicero has expressed in the following words; and, from the fimilitude of the expref-c Mr. Foster, who had undoubtedly examined this matter more thoroughly than I pretend to have done, does not, I think, produce any such clearly appropriated term, from Aristotle, Plato, Aristoxenus, or any other writer of that age. See ch. v. p. 140, &c. of his very learned Essay on Accent and Quantity, &c.

d See the passage from Euclid, below. Thus too Bacchius: Τροπως της φωνης ποσως λεγομεν είναι; — Τρεις· όξυν, ΜΕΣΟΝ, βαρυν. p. 10. ed. Meib. — meaning, by μεσον, the Phrygian mode or key, which was between the Dorian and the Lydian, as D is between C and E.—So Arist. Quintil. τωτων, ὁ μεν δωριΦ, προς τα βαρυτερα της φωνης ένεργηματα χρησιμΦ· ὁ δε λυδιΦ, προς τα όξυτερα· ὁ δε φρυνιΦ, προς τα ΜΕΣΑ. p. 25.

^e See Mr. Foster's Essay, p. 23, 24, 25.

fion, it feems probable, that he had this very passage of Aristotle before him, or in his memory.—" Nam voces, ut chordæ, funt "intenta, quæ ad quemque tactum respondeant, acuta, gravis; " cita, tarda; magna, parva; quas tamen inter omnes est sua quo-" que in genere mediocris."—That is, as it feems rightly explained by Dr. Pearce, every one of these differences of voice, high and low, loud and foft, &c. has its medium—usrov. To this passage of Cicero, I shall add one from Quintilian to the same purpose, and which affords a still clearer commentary upon that in the Rhetoric of Aristotle.—" Utendi voce multiplex ratio. Nam præter illam " differentiam quæ est tripartita, acutæ, gravis, flexæ,—tum intentis, "tum remissis—tum elatis, tum inferioribus modis, opus est,— " spatiis quoque lentioribus aut citatioribus. Sed iis ipsis MEDIA "interjacent multa"." If the reader compares this with the passage of Aristotle, he will see how exactly it answers to the Greek. Here are three differences of voice corresponding plainly to the three mentioned by Aristotle. The difference of intentis and remissis (bud and soft) expresses his megany nas unea; that of, elatis, et inserioribus modis, (acuter, or graver, tones or pitches,) his design иги Вирыц; and that of spatiis lentioribus, &c. (quicker or flower times) his ρυθμοις τισι, &c. And, that Quintilian did not understand, by offer and Bagein, the acute and grave syllabic accent, is clear from his expressly faying, that there are those three differences besides that of the different accents—" præter illam differentiam," &c.— Lastly, the "media interjacent multa," plainly alludes to the μεση of Aristotle.

The following passage, from the clear and accurate musical treatise of Euclid, will serve to illustrate, at the same time, both the terms of Aristotle, Torons and passage. Enumerating the different accep-f Cic. de Or. III. 57. p. 4 7, ed. Pearce.

z II. 3.

h Whenever Aristotle clearly speaks of accents, he always, as far as I have observed, will the wind accompose, not rosso. See the passages above referred to, in the treatise D. Sept. Elemb. And, in this work, cap. xxv.

tations of the word $\tau ov \otimes$, one of which is $\tau \alpha \sigma \iota \varsigma$, tension or pitch, his inftance of that sense of the word, is, δ de, $\delta \varsigma$, $\tau \alpha \sigma \iota \varsigma$, $\tau ov \otimes \lambda \varepsilon - \gamma \varepsilon \tau \alpha \iota$, δ quiev $\delta \xi \upsilon \tau \circ \varepsilon \varepsilon \upsilon$, η Ragutoveiu, η MESQ ι TQ ι THS $\Phi \Omega NH \Sigma$ TON $\Omega \iota$ reconstant: i. e. a middling pitch of voice.

On the whole, then, I see no reason why we should not understand the word $\mu \in \sigma \omega$ to be used in the same sense in the passage which is the subject of this note. For though, indeed, Aristotle is there speaking of single letters, and therefore can only mean syllabic accents or tones, yet it is plain, that these accents must have admitted of the distinction of bigh, low, and intermediate, even in single words, when of more than two syllables is much more, in whole sentences or periods, where what Mr. Foster calls the oratorial accent, (if, indeed, it be compatible with a fixed syllabic accentuation of single words, of which I profess myself not yet convinced,) must necessarily have varied the tone or pitch of the same nominal syllabic accent, from word to word.

But whatever fense of the word person we adopt, there is a difficulty, in this passage, which I must leave as I find it. The mention of tone or pitch of voice here, seems to me to be strangely misplaced. Accent, or tone, belongs to syllables, not to letters, of which Aristotle is here speaking. The vowels, indeed, may be acute or grave; but as syllables making a part of words, not as letters, separately considered, as they here are.—Besides; the other differences mentioned are fixed, essential differences. Of these letters, he says, some are formed in this manner, and others, in that: some are aspirated, and others smooth—some long, others short. But, can it be said, with any propriety, that some are acute, and others grave? Are there vowels that are always acute, as there are vowels that are always long?—This feems not more accurate, than it would be to conclude an enumeration of the differences of words, by adding that some are faid, and some are fung:—or rather, it seems just the same, as if a man, describing the different sorts of bricks that are made, should conclude with telling us, that some are put at the top of a wall, some at bottom, and some in the middle.

¹ P. 20, ed. Meib.

^{*} Let any man pronounce a word of many fyll.bles—μεγαλοπειπέτατα, f r example—having one acute fyllable, as D. Halic. fays, among many grave—èν πουλοις βαςειαις. Sett. 11. He will hear plainly, if he has any ear, that the acute fyllable is only the acuteft; and that the grave fyllables are of different degrees of elevation, and some of them of course, μεσαι—intermediate, between the most acute and the most grave.

N O T E 170.

P. 105. A CONJUNCTION IS A SOUND, &c.—

The whole of this first definition of the conjunction appears to me to be corrupt beyond all hope of restoration from conjecture. Mr. Harris plainly passes it over as inexplicable, and takes the second definition only. I may well, therefore, be excused for not attempting to translate, what I confess myself totally unable to comprehend. I do, indeed, understand very well, that a conjunction, "neither binders nor constitutes—neither gives nor takes away —the meaning of the sentence in which it stands." But how this can be regarded as a definition of a conjunction, I do not understand. To define a thing only by what it does not do, (for it is here given as a separate and complete definition,) is hardly reconcileable with Aristotle's logical accuracy. Dacier, in his translation, has obviated this objection, by uniting the two definitions; but without any authority from the text.

I must, again, confess, that what follows, about the situation of the conjunction in different parts of a sentence, has not been ² Hermes, II. 2. note (a).

b See Topic, lib. vi. cap. 6. Sect. 5.—where he represents a definition as vitious, ἐαν ἀποφασει διαιρη το γεν Φ—i. e. if the specific difference be expressed by a negation. He excepts the definition of mere privations, (as blindness,) which can be defined no otherwise. Sect. 7.

made intelligible to me, by any explication I have feen; particucularly, the expression, nas autor, which M. Batteux, after Castelvetro, renders, "by its nature:"—"à moins que par elle-même "elle ne soit faite pour être au commencement." But this sense cannot be admitted; nor, I think, any other, than—"by itself—" alone." This Mr. Winstanley explains by ανευ ανταποδοτεως: but I cannot see how his translation—" modo eas conjunctiones exci"pias quæ in initio periodi, nas αυτες,—ritè stare non possunt," &c.—accords with Aristotle's words—ην μη αρμοττη εν αρχη λογε τιθεναι nas αυτον—i. e. "unless they are such as should be placed in "the beginning, by themselves."—To make these words correspond to Mr. Winstanley's version, another negative seems wanting.

N O T E 171.

P. 105. AN ARTICLE----MARKS THE BEGINNING OR THE END OF A SENTENCE.

The commentators all tell us, that this means the prepositive, and the subjunctive article; but none of them have clearly and fairly shewn us, how the one, because it is placed before a word, marks the beginning of a sentence or discourse, (AOPOY a_{QXNV} ;) or, how the other marks the end of it, because it sollows the word to which it belongs. In the very sentence before us, for example, $A_{Q} f_{QOV} \delta_{1} \delta_{2}$, $q_{ON} q_{ON} \delta_{1} \delta_{2}$, $q_{ON} q_{ON} \delta_{2}$ in what sense does the subjunctive article, \hat{q}_{i} , mark the end of the sentence— $\tau_{1} \delta_{0} \delta_{0} \delta_{1} \delta_{0} \delta_{1}$ is called subjunctive qu'il suit la chose "qu'il designe, comme, qui, lequel."—It is easy to explain things in this manner.

For my part, I see not what is to be made of this, unless we may understand Aristotle to mean only that power of the article, the predicate, in certain propositions, and determines the order of ction. See Hermes, II. 1. p. 230.—But, then, this is no other than a species of diograps, and is, indeed, given by Mr. Harris as one example of the definitive or ascertaining power of the article.

The fecond definition of the article, ($-\varphi\omega\eta$ àσημω------to συντιζεσθαι) I have omitted. It is the first definition of the conjunction repeated verbatim. It may, indeed, be true of both; but if so, it must inevitably follow, I think, either that the two things must be the same, or, that the words are not truly a definition of either. Yet this passes simoothly with all the commentators I have seen, except Madius and Piccolomini.

N O T E 172.

P. 105. For even in double words, &c.

Compare cap. ii. and iv. of Aristotle's treatise Π_{eql} Equaveiacs. This is rendered by Piccolomini, with his usual accuracy, "pe-"rochè nei nomi doppij [ò ver composti] non usiamo le parti d'essi, "secondo che, da per se prese, hanno significatione: come, (per essem-"pio) in questo nome Theodoro, quella parte (doro) non é signi-"ficante." p. 286.

N O T E 173.

P. 106. INDICATION OF TIME IS NOT INCLUDED, &c.—

'Ou ΠΡΟΣΣΗΜΑΙΝΕΙ το ποτε. See Hermes, I. 6, note (d), p. 96. Aristotle has given a fuller definition of the verb, in the book περι Ερμ. cap. iii.

N O T E 174.

P. 106. OTHERS RELATE TO ACTION OR PRONUNCIA-

'Η δε, κατα τα ὑωοκριτικα—sc. σχηματα: meaning the σχηματα λεξεως mentioned just before, cap. xix. with which these modes plainly coincide; for the πτωσεις ρηματων here mentioned are no other than the Ἐγκλισεις, modes, or moods, of the Grammarians.— [See Hermes, I. 8, p. 144, and particularly the notes there.] Και κατα ποιας ἐγκλισεις, άς δη τινες ΠΤΩΣΕΙΣ ΡΗΜΑΤΙΚΑΣ καλεσι. Dion. Hal. de Struct. &c. Sect. 6.—But be speaks of the term as applied only to the modes; for the tenses, διαφοραι χρονων, are immediately after mentioned by him, as not included in that term. But Aristotle, in the περι έρμην. expressly mentions the tenses also, as πτωσεις έηματων. See cap. iii. Sect. 5.

N O T E 175.

P. 106. FOR ALL DISCOURSE IS NOT COMPOSED OF VERBS AND NOUNS:—THE DEFINITION OF MAN, FOR INSTANCE—.

— 'Ου γαρ άπας λογ εκ βηματαν και ἐνοματων συγκειται ὁιρν, ὁ τε ἀνθρωπε ὁρισμω ἀλλ ἐνδεχεται ἀνευ ξηματων ἐιναι λογον. This is very ambiguously expressed. We are left to make out, as well as we can, whether the "definition of man," is referred to as an instance of a sentence without a verb, or of a sentence with both noun and verb.—The construction seems, indeed, to lead more naturally to the latter interpretation. But the other, I think, is more to Aristotle's purpose, (for, an example of a sentence with both noun and verb, it was hardly necessary to produce,) and is confirmed by the following passage in his book περι Ερμηνείας:

Αναγκη δε παντα λογον ἀποφαντικον (every affertive fentence or speech) ἐκ ἐριματω ἐιναι, ἡ ἐκ πτωσεως ἑριματω και γαρ ὁ τε ἀνθρωπε λογω (i. e. ἱρισμω, definition; for so λογω is continually used by Aristotle,) ἐαν μη το, ἐςιν, ἡ, ἐςαι, ἡ τι τοιετον ΠΡΟΣΤΕΘΗι, ἐπω λογω ἀποφαντικω . The definition itself, (the same, probably, to which he alludes in the passage before us,) follows; it is, ζωον πεζον διπεν . Now these three words alone constitute the definition, and it is of this only that Aristotle here speaks. In the full, affertive sentence, Ανθρωπω ἐςι ζωον πεζον διπεν, the two first words are no part of the definition itself, but, as Victorius has well observed, only indicate the thing defined. And accordingly, the philosopher, we see, in the above quotation, considers the verb as superadded to the definition.

However, this sense would be so much more clearly expressed, if the words—διον, δ τε ανθρωπε δχισμ®—followed, instead of preceding, the words αλλ' ενδεχεται ανευ βηματων είναι λογον, that I should hardly doubt of their being misplaced, if this fort of embarrassiment were less frequent than it is in Aristotle's writings.

This whole passage receives much illustration from that part of the treatise περι έρμ. to which I have referred. A sentence without a verb is what Aristotle calls a significant sentence, but not an assertive sentence, or proposition; i. e. that assume or denies something, and of which it may be predicated, that it is true, or salse. Such only, in that logical work, it was to his purpose to consider; the other, the merely significant sentence, he dismisses, as belonging rather to rhetoric and POETRY. Or μεν εν άλλοι [λογοι], άφεισ-βωσων έμπορωμες γαρ, η ΠΟΙΗΤΙΚΗΣ, δικειστερα ή σκεψις. ὁ δε άποφαντικώς της νυν θεωριας.

^a P. 38, C.

b The same definition occurs in other parts of his works; vol. i. p. 167, B.—237, D.—vol. ii. 920, 921.

See cap. iv. fest. 4 and 5. p. 38.

d He inflances in precatory fentences or speeches;—ωω, ή δυχη, γογ⊕ μεν, ανοί επε ισνέης, επε ψευδης. Ibid.

^{*} Ibid.

NOTE 176.

P. 106. SIGNIFICANT, AS THE WORD CLEON IS, &c.

It has been observed, that the sense seemed to require an instance of a sentence with only one significant word; at least, not composed of both verb and noun, as βαδίζει Κλεων is. But I rather believe, that Aristotle did not intend this as an instance of such a sentence, but merely as an explanation of the σημαινει, and καθ άντα σημαινει τι, that precede. "It is not," says he, "essential to "what I call λογω, oratio, that it should contain both a noun and a verb, i. e. that it should be a complete proposition: but some significant part it must have; significant, I mean, as a whole "word, separately taken, as Cleon is, for example, in the sentence, "Cleon walks; not as making a part of a word, like δωρον in the compound name Θεοδωρον, which bas, indeed, a meaning, but not "μαθ' ἀυτο—κεχωριτμένον—by itself—as a word in the sentence."

That this is the meaning, feems probable from the chapter in which Λογ is defined in the book περι Ερμηνειας. For there, as foon as he has given the definition, (Λογ δε εςι φωνη σημαντικη ής των μερων ΤΙ σημαντικον εςι ΚΕΧΩΡΙΣΜΕΝΟΝ,) he immediately proceeds to explain the expressions; declaring what fort of significant part he means. "Significant," he says, "as the word αν"θρωπ is; that is, πεχωρισμενον, by itself; not as, ανθρωπ εςι, or κκ εςι, which signify as affertive sentences, nor yet, as a syllable, or part of a simple word, (like νς in μυς,) or, even as a word making part of a compound word."

Now, what Aristotle there expresses fully, he meant, I think, to say, more briefly, in the words, ΜΕΡΟΣ μεντοι ἀει ΤΙ σημαινον εξει· ὁιον ἐν τω, Βαδιζει Κλεων, ὁ Κλεων. [sc. σημαινει.]

See Hermes, I. 2, p. 21, note (d).

^a Cap. iv. p. 38.

N O T E 177.

P. 107. A DISCOURSE MAY BE ONE, IN TWO SENSES, &c.

Compare, περι Ερμην. cap. v. p. 38.—Analyt. Post. lib. ii. cap. 10. p. 169, E.—Ivletaphys. VII. 4. p. 910, D. (where he uses τω συνέχει, as equivalent to συνδεσμω) and VIII. 6, p. 931, C.

N O T E 178.

P. 107. LIKE MANY OF THOSE USED BY THE MEGALIOTÆ---

I have read, in some ludicrous book, of a country that was " lost by the ignorance of geographers." This seems to have been the case of these Megaliotæ, if such a people ever existed. They are nowhere recorded.—Decier reads, μεγαρίζοιτων—" ceux qui " disent de grandes choses: and cites Hefrelius—Μεγαρίζοιτες—μεγαλα λεγοντες. But this is too distant from the present reading, Μεγαλωνων. Mr. Winstanley's conjecture—μεγαλειων, ως a, is somewhat nearer, and, in other respects, preserable: but it is, I think, a strong presumption against its truth, that Aristotic constantly uses are, when he gives an instance; never, as far as I recollect, ως.

I have fometimes thought it not very improbable, that the passage might originally have stood thus: των μεγαλΑ ΔιωΚΟΝτων: i. e. of those who affect, aim at, are fond of, grandeur and pomp of expression; who love kard words, as we say. Nothing more common than this sense of diameter. They who are versed in emendatory criticism, and the theory of transcriptive blunders, know it to have been one source of corruption in antient manuscripts, that the transcribers, when they found vacuities and lucunæ which they could not fill up, rather than reduce the price of their copy by visible imperfection, often chose to write the passage as if there had been no such chasins; especially when that could be done, as in this case, with some passable appearance of a meaning. And thus, here, if we suppose the letters I have distinguished by capitals to have been destroyed, or rendered illegible, in the original MS. ὑπο νοτιας και σητων , they would leave exactly the letters we now have—μεγαλιωτων.

If a commentator, harrasted by obscurity and perplexity, can now and then relieve his labour by treating a passage of desperate corruption as a riddle, and can amuse himself by guessing the meaning, when he cannot inform his readers by discovering it, who will envy him this harmless privilege? I have here hazarded my guess with others; but I give it for what it is. None of us, I believe, have yet deprived our successors of the same amusement. The riddle, probably, still remains, and will remain, till the arrival of those "codices expessandi" of which the critics talk so much; those precious manuscripts, that are always to be waited for, and never to be expessed.

N O T E 179.

P. 107. By common words, I Mean &c.

Kugiov.—I have translated this, common, not proper, because this last term would convey a wrong idea; for κυρίον here is plainly opposed, not to μεταφορα only, but to all the other species of words just enumerated: not to what is figurative only, as the Latin proprium is, but to whatever is unusual. This appears indeed from b See Le Clerc's Ars Critica, P. III. S. I. C.XVI. parag. 7.

3 K

^e See the passage from Strabo, given in the preface.

the definition—" a word that every body uses." What we call proper words are only one fort of the regar displace of Aristotle. The expression must even include all those words, which, though originally metaphorical, are, as Mr. Harris says, " so naturalized" by common use, " that ceasing to be metaphors, they are become, " (as it were,) the proper words"." That is, as an excellent writer has expressed it, " they have nothing of the effect of me—" taphor upon the hearer. On the contrary, like proper terms, " they suggest directly to his mind, without the intervention of " any image, the ideas which the speaker proposed to convey by " them"."

The fame clear opposition of κυρίου to whatever is uncommon in speech appears throughout the next chapter, where γλωττα, μεταφορα, &c. are all said to be ΠΑΡΑ το κυρίου, and included under one common term of ξενικα.—See also Rhet. III. 2. p. 585, A.

N O T E 180.

P. 107. SO THAT THE SAME WORD MAY BE BOTH COM-MON AND FOREIGN, &C.

If κυριον here meant only native, in opposition to foreign, (γλωττα) as some commentators have supposed, it would be arrant trisling to observe, that the same word might be, at the same time, γλωττα and κυριον, i. e. foreign and native, to different nations. For it could not possibly be otherwise; as Robortelli observes, and calls the observation, which he explains as Aristotle's, "magnoperè adno"tandum, et Pulchrum scitu" p. 246. Dacier follows him:

7

⁻ Phil. Inq. p. 198. He gives for instances—the foot of a mountain—the bed of a river. He, also, has rendered xuguor by common, p. 191, note.

b Philiss. of Rhet. vol. i. p. 185, 186. See Demet. Πεςι Εдиниваς, Sect. 88.

⁻ Robortelli, and Castelvetro after him.

"Cela ne sçauroit être autrement, le même mot qui est etranger pour celui qui l'emprunte, ne peut qu'être propre pour celui qui le "prête."—But, if it must be so, why does Aristotle say it may be so?—èwas δυνατον?—The truth is, that a foreign word is not necesfarily a common word, in his sense of κυριον, among the people to whom it is native; it may, or may not, be so; it cannot, indeed, be to them γλωττα, but it may be a metaphorical word, or a word of any of the other species enumerated as IIAPA το κυριον.—Aristotle seems to have added this observation on purpose to prevent the very mistake which these expositors have made: to prevent κυριον from being taken merely as the opposite to γλωττα.

N O T E 181.

P. 108. A THOUSAND IS A CERTAIN DEFINITE MANY.

To γαρ μυριου, πολυ έςι.—Here, I may venture, I believe, for once, to adopt the positive tone of emendatory criticism. Legendum omninò, πολυ ΤΙ έςι. The sense, indeed, no one can mistake: but the text, as it stands, does not express that sense. It says only, "for a thousand is many, which he now uses instead of many." There can be no doubt, that Aristotle added TI here, as in all the other instances, έςαναι ΤΙ — ἀφελειν ΤΙ. But, to put the matter beyond all doubt, he afterwards, speaking of the same fort of nictaphor, says, το γαρ Παντες αντι τε Πολλοι, κατα μεταφορου, είνηται το γαρ Παν, ΠΟΛΥ ΤΙ. Cap. xxv.—I am surprised that so very obvious an error should have escaped the notice of all the commentators I am acquainted with.

b Cap. xxii.

N O T E 182.

P. 108. FOR HERE, THE POET USES ταμαν---INSTEAD OF αξυσαι, &c.

Here a commentator is not perplexed by a little glimmering of light, that promifes to shew him something, and shews him nothing; but is relieved at once from all trouble by a total and comfortable obscurity. The quotations are so short, and, in all probability, fo incorrect, that it feems impossible to apply to them Aristotle's definition of this metaphor, or to see how, where the Poet has used Tamer, apuras would have been the proper word, and vice versa. Yet the commentators slide over this difficulty. Victorius, however, has noticed it, and, giving up the quotations as inexplicable and incorrigible, proposes a more intelligible example from the Rhetoric, III. 2.—το φαναι, τον μεν πτωχευοντα, ευχεσθαι. τον δε ευχομενον, πτωχευειν' ότι άμφω άιτησεις. Dacier has entirely omitted the passage, and substituted another from the Rhet. III. 11. p. 597, B.—Not, however, that he did not understand the paffage; it was an inviolable rule with him always to understand his author: but only, it feems, because the example could not conveniently be expressed in French-" il ne peut être traduit en " nôtre langue."

Castelvetro gives a very pleasant illustration. He does not pretend to see how $\tau \alpha \mu \alpha \nu$ and $\alpha \rho \nu \sigma \alpha \nu$ are put for each other in the Greek examples: but he says, that, to draw, and to cut off, might be thus metaphorically put for each other; if, for example, we should say, "Take this pruning hook, and draw some "branches from the olive-tree: or, Take this pail, and cut off "some water from the sountain"."—Undoubtedly any man may speak in this way, who chuses it.

[&]quot; Prendi quella falce, c attigni de'rami dell' ulivo; o vero, Prendi quella fecchia, " e tagha dell' acqua del fonte." p. 453.

N O T E 183.

P. 108. In the way of analogy, when of four terms, &c.

The difficulty here is, to diftinguish clearly this, which Aristotle calls the analogical or proportional metaphor, from the metaphor which precedes it—that from species to species: for as to the two first forts, that from genus to species, and vice versa, they plainly belong, as has been observed, to the trope since denominated synecdoche; the word μεταφορα being clearly used by Aristotle in its most general sense, including all the tropes—all the ways in which a word is transferred to a meaning different from its proper meaning. See Cic. Or. cap. xxvii. Of the four species of μεταφορα here mentioned, only the two last seem to answer to our META-PHOR—the metaphor sounded on some resemblance between the thing from which, and that to which, the term is transferred.

The difference between these two sorts of metaphors, as far as I am able to comprehend it, appears to me to be only this. Each of them is sounded on some resemblance; but in the first, the resemblance perceived is between the two things themselves; in the other, between the relations which they, respectively, bear to two other things. Those are metaphors απ' είδες επι είδω, where the likeness is perceived, as Aristotle elsewhere expresses it, "by the genus;" that is, where the common quality, which constitutes the likeness, immediately occurs, and it is, therefore, sufficient simply to substitute the one word for the other. Those are metaphors κατ' ἀναλογιαν, where the resemblance is not thus perceived by the common quality, but by the common relation, of the two things; where, therefore, that relation must be pointed out, more or less expressly. Thus, to take Aristotle's own examples, when old age, or rather, an old man, is called "flubble," the resemblance is sufficiently perceived, by a comparison of the things themselves; in Aristotle's language, we perceive it "by the genus:—δτων γαρ είπη [Όμης] το γηρας ΚΛΛΑΜΗΝ, εποιησε μαθησιν και γνωσιν δια τα γενας ΑΜΦΩ γαρ ΑΠΗΝΘΗΚΟΤΑ. But when old age is called "evening," what strikes us is the resemblance with respect to two other things, life, and day; a resemblance of relation.

² h γαρ ΑΝΑΛΟΓΙΑ ίσοτης έτι λεγε, ΚΑΙ ΕΝ ΤΕΤΤΑΡΣΙΝ ΕΛΑΧΙΣΤΟΙΣ. i. e. ⁴ Analogy, or proportion, is equality of ratio, or relation, and requires four terms at ⁴ leaft." Ethic. Nicom. V. 3.

In this idea of the analogical metaphor I have the concurrence of Piccolomini. "La metafora di proportione è quella, che fopra "la fomiglianza dei rispetti che hanno l'une cose con l'altre, sarà son- data;" &c. See his annotations, p. 305, and his clear and useful, though prolix, Parafrase della Retor. d'Arist. tom. iii. p. 52, &c. In the rest of his explanation he does not satisfy me.

N O T E 184.

P. 108. And, sometimes, the proper term is also introduced, besides its relative term.

—Και ἐνιστε προστιθεασιν ἀνθ' ἐ λεγει προς ὁ ἐςι. — No words can well be more obscure and perplexing. Taking them as they are, they seem to admit, fairly, of only one sense—that which Victorius gives them. "Et quandoque apponunt, pro quo dicit ad quod est." That is, as he explains this literal and obscure version, they add, "ad quod refereur illud nomen quod omittunt, et pro quo aliud "vocabulum usurpant." Προςιθεασι, προς ὁ ἐςι [sc. τυτο] ἀνθ' ε λεγει: i. e. they add, to the substituted word (υπρ), the word to which

b Rhet. III. 10. p. 593. The passage of Homer alluded to is in Od. 2. 214, 215. See Harris's Philel. Inq. p. 191. For the force of the expression, έποιησε μαθηση, fee NOTE 22.

the proper word (sield) relates; i. e. Mars. They not only name cup, instead of shield, but call it the cup of Mars.

My objection to this fense of the passage is, that it seems to confound the analogical metaphor with that from species to species, in which one word is simply put in the room of the other, as nanapa is used in the passage of Homer, referred to by Aristotle as an example of that fort of metaphor^a:

For if, "fometimes," eviote, this addition is made, it is implied, that not only fometimes, but generally, and for the most part, the analogical metaphor is used in the same manner as that $\frac{\partial \pi}{\partial t}$ &c. and cup is merely called shield, and old age, evening. But, if I understand the matter rightly, it is essential to this kind of metaphor to express two terms, at least, of the four which constitute the analogy; i. e. to express with the metaphorical word, either the thing to which the proper word belongs, (as, evening of life,) or, as Aristotle presently after says, a negative epilibet. See NOTE 189.

And the philosopher himself seems to have said this, (for I confess the passage is not perfectly clear,) in the following words: AIEI γαρ ΕΚ ΔΥΟΙΝ λεγονται [sc. άι ἐνικικε, comparisons], ΩΣΠΕΡ Ἡ ΑΝΑΛΟΓΟΝ ΜΕΤΑΦΟΡΑ· διον, ἡ ἀσπις, φαμον, ἐξι ΦΙΑΛΗ ΑΡΕΟΣ, και, τοξον, ΦΟΡΜΙΓΞ ΑΧΟΡΔΟΣ· ἐτω μει ἐν λεγεσιν, ΟΥΧ ΑΠΑΟΥΝ· το δ' ἐιπειν το τοξον " φορμιγγα," ἡ την ἀσπιδια " φιαλη," ΑΠΛΟΥΝ·. Thus " capitis nives '," for gray hairs; evening of life; morring of the year; eye of day; and, among many instances in the Rectoric,

^{*} He does not, indeed, expressly call it, ἀπ' έλλες ἐπι έλλΦ; but that it is so, seems sufficiently clear from his expressions, ἐποιπσε μαένται δια τε ΓΕΝΟΥΣ—and, ΛΜΦΩ γος ἀπανθημοτα, which answers to ἀμφω γας ἀφελειν τι ἐει, here.

^b Rhet. III. 11. p. 596. E.

e Quintil. VIII. 6.

δημε ροπαλου—λημη τε Παραιεως—δδω των λογων, &c d.—The fact, indeed, feems to be, that this analogical metaphor is only a way of stating metaphors founded on resemblance *, when that resemblance, depending wholly, or chiefly, on relation, would not be obvious, and the metaphor, consequently, would be harsh and obscure, unless the relation were, by some means or other, pointed out.—Victorius himself allows, that, in Aristotle's own examples, the mere substitution of cup for skield, and of evening for old age, would be "ninis durum."

I think, then, that Aristotle meant to say, and, in some way or other, had said, "And fometimes," (ἐνωτε,) now and then, for the sake of clearness, "they add the proper word, (the word, ἀνθ' ἐ—"for which, the metaphorical word is put,) to, or besides, the προς "δ' ἐςι—i. e. that to which the proper word relates." They not only call the shield, the cup of Mars, but they mention shield also, and say, the skield is the cup of Mars: or, taking the other instance, old age is the evening of life". Thus all will sollow naturally: KAI ἐνιοτε— And, sometimes, they add the proper term, &c. Ενιοις δε, ἐιὰ ἐςιν ὀνομα—ἀναλογον.—But, in some analogical metaphors, there is no proper term; in that case, therefore, the meta-

'Ουδ' ένηςὲ έρετμα, τα τε πτεςα νηνοι πελονται.

Od. A. 124.

d Rhet. III. 10.—Inflances abound in Homer: —πνοχ⊕ νη Φ — έδας άς ειρης – ποιμενα πας τος περμα πυς Φ — a feed of fire, for a spark. (Od. E. 490.) &c.—See the Life of Homer, commonly attributed to Dion. Halic. and given in vol. v. of the ed. of Homer by Ernestus, p. 162.

^{*} It feems, that any inflance of the metaphora à specie &c. may be flated analogically: thus, "old age, we may say, is to man, what slubble is to corn," &c. And, on the other hand, converting an analogical metaphor into a metaphor from species to species, we may say, evening and old age are, both of them, ends of certain portions of time.—It was, perhaps, the vicinity of these two species of metaphor, and their convertibility, that induced later writers to drop the distinction, though they made many other distinctions which Aristotle did not.

^{*} Thus Homer uses the analogical metaphor in the following line:

[&]quot; Oars, which are the wings of ships."

phor cannot be so used: yet it may be used in the first, and most common way, as well as if such proper term subsisted; it is still an analogical metaphor, and may be used as such:—2der https, busings [i. e. dradogues, as Castelvetro rightly explains it,] dexenseral. Thus, in the metaphor exemplified, of swing, applied to the fun, we may say the sun sows his rays, though we cannot assign any proper term, for which sows is put—any word appropriated to the dispersion of light from the sun, as, to sow, is appropriated to the dispersion of seed.—Such appears to me to be the connection of this passage.

It will, undoubtedly, be objected, that the fense I would give the words προςιθεασι &c. cannot be fairly obtained from them as they now fland: and I confess it cannot; unless we might be allowed to render the words thus, taking $\pi \rho o s$ as a repetition of the preposition in προστιθεασιν: " they add the word, for which they use, " or say, the metaphorical word, (α: 9' & ΛΕΓΕΙ,) to δΕΣΤΙ—to " what it is—to the word which is used: they add the word that " should be to the word that is." But this appears to me so harsh and improbable a conftruction, that I would rather suppose the passage to be defective. Perhaps it might originally be thus:-Και ένιοτε προστιθ. άνθ' έ λεγει, ΠΑΡΑ [το] προς ὁ ἐςι—i. e. be/ides adding the thing to which the proper term relates. But there feems to be still another fault in the passage. I cannot reconcile the plural προστιθεασιν, with the fingular, λεγει. Goulston renders "apponit;" and I am surprised that no MS. should exhibit $\pi \rho \circ \sigma$ τιθησιν. That λεγει is right, is highly probable, from the fingular verb έρει, repeatedly used here, and the ἐιποι, afterwards: ἐι την ασπιδα ΕΙΠΟΙ-κ. τ. αλλ.

The transcribers, seeing two prepositions, $\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \pi \rho \rho s$, unusually put together, and not understanding the relative sense of $\pi \rho \rho s$ is, might reject the first as redundant.

N O T E 185.

P. 108. THE SMIELD, THE CUP OF MARS, &c.

Φιαλην Αςεως—. The φιαλη seems to have been a large, expanded, (ἐμπεταλον,) kind of vessel, like a ewer. See Il. ψ. 270, and the notes. Hesych. v. Αμφιθετ.—It had also, sometimes, an ἐμφαλος, or umbo. See Athen. p. 501. It had probably, therefore, some resemblance to a shield, which makes the metaphor appear less strange; as Piccolomini has remarked, p. 306: who also observes, very well, that this kind of metaphor is then most clear and perfect, when the resemblance of relation is aided by some degree of resemblance between the things themselves: and that here, for example, if lance were used instead of shield, the metaphor would be spoiled, though the common relation would still subsist.

This feems to have been a favourite instance of this sort of metaphor; for it occurs several times in the Rhetoric. See III. 4, p. 588, and 11, p. 596, E. In the former of these passages Aristotle says, that an analogical metaphor ought to admit of inversion: thus, says he, if we may call the cup the shield of Bacchus, we may, with equal propriety, call the shield the cup of Mars. But Demetrius observes, alluding to that passage of the Rhetoric, that this is not the case of every such metaphor: êne the suggestion was the total observed the same to mountain the same to a describe the same to mountain the same to the same to may be the same to the same the same that the same the same to mountain the same that the same the same to mountain the same that the same the same tha

N O T E 186.

P. 108. OR AS EMPEDOCLES HAS EXPRESSED IT, LIFE'S SETTING SUN.

Δυσμας βιε.—Victorius has pointed out this expression in Plato's fixth book De Legibus, where the Athenian says, ήμεις δ' ἐν δυσμαις τε βιε, δι δε, ῶς προς ήμας, νεοι': probably alluding, in Plato's usual manner, to the very passage of Empedocles. See also Ælian, Var. Hist. H. 34.—ἐπι δυσμαις ἐσμεν: where, as the metaphor was sufficiently explained by the subject of the conversation, the word βιε is not added. Victorius remarks, also, the βιε ΔΥΝΤΟΣ ἀυγαις of Æschylus, Agamem. v. 1132. The rest of that passage is very obscure by that opens, for the last time, upon the light:——

Βλεψαι προς ΑΥΓΑΣ βελεται τας ήλιε,

Ως εποτ' ἀυθις, ἀλλα νυν πανυς ατον,

Ακτινα, κυκλονθ', ήλιε προσοψεται. Eurip. Alceft. 203.

or, in the finest picture of the kind, I think, that Poetry affords, — — oculique errantibus, alto Quæsivit cœlo lucem, ingemuitque repertâ. Æn. IV. 691. —The poetical reader, I believe, will pardon me, if I wander so much farther from my subject, as to take occasion, from these beautiful passages, to point out three lines of Petrarch, which shew,

- * Ed. Serr. tom. ii. p. 770.
- I am inclined to read, and point the passage thus:

— — άτε και δος: πτωσιΜΟΥΣ Ξυνανυτει, βια δυντΦ ἀυγαις.

i. e. " fuch as destroys, dispatches (as we say,) those who full by the spear, in the last " gleans of setting life."

that his powers were not confined to the expression of amorous tenderness, but were capable of rising, on occasion, to the true sublime. In the sonnet, "Se lamentar augelli," &c. written after the death of Laura, he imagines himself to hear her voice, in his solitude, consoling him for his loss, in these lines:

Di me non pianger tu; ch' i miei dì fersi Morendo eterni; e, NEL ETERNO LUME, Quando mostrai di chiuder gli' occhi, APERSI!—

N O T E 187.

P. 108. There is no proper analogous term, &c.

Ονομα καμενον.—Καμενον, here, is equivalent to κυζιον; a word established by common usage.—Ετι, ει ΜΗ ΚΕΙΜΕΝΟΙΣ ονομασι χρηται, είνν Πλατων, οφουοσκιον, τον οφθαλμον. — — παν γαρ ασαφες το ΜΗ ΕΙΩΘΟΣ.—Τορίε. VI. 2. p. 242.—See also, Categ. c. vii. p. 23, C.

N O T E 188.

P. 109. — — SOWING ABROAD
HIS HEAVEN-CREATED FLAME.

Σπειρων θεοκτισων φλογω.—Part of an Iambic verse, and probably from some Tragic Poet. The commentators quote Virgil's "Spargebat lumine terras." This, however, is not exactly applicable, because spargere does not, I think, appear to have been the proper, specific word, for sowing, as σπειρείν was. The passage of Lucretius is more apposite:

Sol etiam fummo de vertice dissupat omnes II. 211. Ardorem in partes, et lumine conserir arva.

Every reader will recollect Milton's beautiful application of this metaphor to the stars:

> And fow'd with stars the heav'n, thick as a field.— P. L. VII. 358.

-and to the dew-drops, metaphorized into pearls, V. 1.

But the idea of pouring, applied to the great fountain of light, feems both a more just, and a more elevated, metaphor. pily touched by Virgil in this line:-

> Jam sole infuso, jam rebus luce retectis. Æn. IX. 461.

-a sketch which Thomson has finely filled up, and finished:

- young day pours in apace, And opens all the lawny prospect wide: The dripping rock, the mountain's misty top, Swell on the fight, and brighten with the dawn; Blue, thro' the dusk, the smoaking currents shine.

Summer, 52.

v. 66.

In his bymn, he has taken up the metaphor in a fublimer tone:

Great fource of day! best image here below Of thy Creator, ever pouring wide, From world to world, the vital ocean round!

-To which I cannot reftrain myself from adding a fine passage of the same kind in the hymn of Dionysius to the sun:

> 'Ακτινα πολυςρεφον αμπλεκων, 'Αιγλας πολυδερκεα " ΠΑΓΑΝ Περι γαιαν άπασαν έλισσων. ΠΟΤΑΜΟΙ δε σεθεν ΠΥΡΟΣ ΑΜΒΡΟΤΟΥ Τικτεσιν έπηρατον άμεραν.

> > NOTE

² M. Burette prefers πολυκερδεα, a reading of a French MS.; and he translates it, "une riche fource." He should have faid, "a cunning fource;" for I do not believe there is good authority for any other fense of monunegong.—See Mem. de l'zicad. des

N O T E 189.

P. 109. THE WINELESS CUP.

Appear. This emendation of Victorius, (instead of ἀλλα ονε, the reading of all the editions and MSS.) seems confirmed, beyond all doubt, by Rhet. III. 6, p. 590, A. and 11, p. 597, A.

Metaphors, from their nature, are in danger of being obscure, or forced, though it is essential to their beauty and essect, that they should be clear and apposite. For this purpose, a metaphor may be guarded in various ways. If the simple substitution of the improper, for the proper, term, would be obscure, or harsh, the metaphor may be converted into an image, or compari find it is may be used analogically, and we may say, $\varphi_{i\alpha\lambda\eta}$ APEOS, or $\varphi_{i\alpha\lambda\eta}$ AQINOS; or, if that be not sufficient for perspicuity—that is, if the meaning be not sufficiently pointed out by the manner, or circumstances, in which the expression is introduced, we may join these, $(\varphi_{i\alpha\lambda\eta})$ Ages and $\varphi_{i\alpha\lambda\eta}$, or even add to either of them the proper word itself.

There is a fine instance of this negative mode of explaining a metaphor, in Isaiah, li. 21. "Thou drunken, but not with wine "."

Inscript. tome vii. Differt. sur la Melopée, &c.—The reader may see the hymn, at the end of the Ox. Aratus, and in Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 90, with a translation. There is, also, a translation in Dodsley's Miscellany, vol. v. But, however partial I may be thought, I must give the bays on this occasion to my friend. He is no professed Poet; but his version has, surely, far more of the animation, enthusiasm, and solemnity of the original. No Persian, indeed, could have entered more thoroughly into the spirit of solar adoration.

- ² See Demet. Sect. 80.—And, again, Sect. 86, of the negative epithet used for the same purpose.
 - See above, NOTE 184.
 - * See Bp. Lowth's Comm. on Ifaiab.

The fame end is often answered by an epithet, affirming of the thing expressed some quality belonging to the thing signified; thus, ships are "floating bulwarks'," and the lyre a "chorded shell," where Dryden has made the same use of the affirmative epithet, chorded, that Theognis did of the negative, $\partial \chi_{00}\partial \Phi_{00}$, in his metaphorical expression for a bow— $\varphi_{00}\mu_{10}\chi^2$ $\partial \chi_{00}\partial \Phi_{00}$. Sometimes the explanatory epithet is itself a metaphor; as in the π_{10} π_{10} π_{10} π_{10} of Euripides;—"winged chariots." Here we have a double metaphor; chariot for ship, and wing for sail.

It should be remembered, that these negative epithets are very common in the Greek Poets. Victorius points out many instances: as, κωμον ἀναυλοτατον, Eurip. Phæniss. 818.—θιασον ἀβακχευτον, Orest. 319.—μηνυτης ἀφθεγκτε, Æsch. Eumen. 245.—ἀπτεςοις πωτημασιν, ibid. 250, &c.

N O T E 190.

P. 109. — — AN INVENTED WORD, &c.

Between this and the preceding definition Aristotle must have placed that of Koops—the ornament, or ornamental word. That it was purposely passed over by him is hardly credible. This is, most probably, one of the lamentable diaggagata that Strabotalks of.

The commentators differ widely as to the meaning of roopus. Castelvetro says, the word admits, here, of five different senses, which he sets up, like nine-pins, for the pleasure of knocking them all down.—The only reasonable account of the matter seems to be that given by Dacier from Victorius. It seems clear enough, [&]quot; Mr. Mason's Ode to the Naval Officers.

d Demet. Sect. 86 .- Arift. Rhet. III. 11, p. 597,

^{*} See the passage in the Preface.

that what Aristotle here calls noope, is included, at least, under what he calls director in the Rhetoric. For he fays, at the end of the next chapter (cap. xxii.) fpeaking of those species of words that are used in prose, that they are these three, το κυριον, και μεταφορα, και ΚΟΣΜΟΣ: and in the Rhetoric, after referring to the very enumeration of words in this chapter, and fetting afide fuch as he calls poetical, (i. e. γλωτται, διπλα δυοματα, &c.) he fays, το δε κυρον, και το ΟΙΚΕΙΟΝ, και μεταφοραί, μοναι χρησιμοί προς την των ψίλων λογων $\lambda \epsilon_{2}^{2} \nu^{2}$ παντε; γαρ μεταφοραις διαλεγονται, και τοις ΟΙΚΕΙΟΙΣ, και τοις πυριοις. And these conside δυσματα, again, seem plainly synonymous with επιθετα, mentioned presently after: - δει δε και τα επιθετα και τας μεταφ. κ. τ. λ.—By δικεια and επιθετα, Aristotle seems to have expressed the genus, of which, noons, the ornamental or embellishing epithet, was a species. But as he has not, by any means, explained himself fully, nor given any definition either of ourseon or emberou, the mist which he has left upon this subject must remain. I shall only remark, that the word zoops is once, (and I think but once,) used by him in his Rhetoric, apparently in the same sense as in this chapter. For, speaking of the propriety of diction, and its correspondence to the subject, he observes, that "an ornament should not "be applied to a mean word; for this," fays he, "has the appear-"ance of burlefque; which is the case with Cleophon, who has "used expressions of this fort as ridiculous, as it would be to " talk of an " August fig-tree"." The word κοσμ@ here, and the example by which he explains it, feem to prove, that 200 µ , in the treatife on Poetry, means such an epithet as embellishes or elevates the thing to which it is applied. For I do not imagine that the term includes what the Grammarians call perpetual epithets, fuch as "bumida vina," yana neurov, &c. because Aristotle expressly says, that the ποσμω is used in common speech: now these b Rhet. III. 2. 585.

^{· —} ματ' έπι τφ έυτελει δνοματι έπη ΚΟΣΜΟΣ· εί δε μη, κωμφδια φαινεται· διον ποιει Κλεο-Των· δικοιως γαρ ένια έλεγε, και ει είπειεν αν, ΠΟΤΝΙΑ ΣΥΚΗ.—ΗΙ. 7, p. 590.

redundant epithets are banished, both by him, and by Quintilian, even from oratory; much more from ordinary discourse.

It may be objected, as it bas been objected by Piccolomini (p. 337), that, as an epithet may, at the same time, be a foreign word, a metaphorical, an extended, or of any of the other sorts, it could not be enumerated by Aristotle as a distinct species of words among the rest. But the truth is, that he is not there enumerating so many distinct species of words, which exclude each other, but only a number of distinct properties of words, several of which may substift together in the same word. Thus, an extended word may, manifestly, be, at the same time, a metaphorical, or a foreign word, or both: a metaphorical word may be, also, an invented, extended, altered word, &c. But none of these words can be, at the same time, numerated, common words; and the only exclusive distinction that Aristotle intended, is between the common word, and the others; all of which are words, on some account or other, uncommon.

N O T E 191.

P. 110. Nouns are divided, &c.

In passages where great corruption and little importance meet, a commentator may be reasonably indulged in silence, or brevity. What all this has to do in the midst of an analysis of poetical language, as distinguished from that of prose, I confess myself totally unable to see.

The defects of the passage have been fully pointed out by almost all the annotators. See Mr. Winstanley's note, p. 300, ed. Ox. 1780.—But we have lately been told, that all the commentators have entirely mistaken the sense of the passage, and supposed it, without reason, to be impersect, merely because they did not see, that Aristotle here speaks, not as a Grammarian, but as a Philosopher, and is considering, not the conventional gender of verbal inflection, but the real gender of the things signified. Thus, it is admitted, indeed, that all words ending in v, and e, are not masculine; yet, if we examine the nature of the things denoted by words of those terminations, we shall find, it seems, that they are masculine, though the words themselves are regarded as seminine *. Let us try, then. Matag, for example, ends in e. Did Aristotle's philosophy lead him to consider a mother as of the masculine gender?

E Rhet. III. 3, p. 587, C.—Quintil. De Instit. Or. VIII. 6.

N O T E 192.

P. 110. THE EXCELLENCE OF DICTION CONSISTS IN BEING PERSPICUOUS, WITHOUT BEING MEAN.

Λεξεως ἀρετη—i. e. of diction, or language, in general; not, "elocutionis Poeticæ," as Goulston and others render it. For Aristotle gives the fame definition of the excellence of oratorical diction, in his Rhetoric; adding, only, with respect to the degree of elevation, such a restriction as his subject there required. Now had he intended here a definition of the language of Poetry, as discriminated from that of Prose, he would hardly have confined himself to two characters common to both; viz. that it should be perspicuous, and yet not mean, or low, like colloquial language, consisting only of common and proper words, without metaphors, or any of the other ornamental words which he enumerates; some of which he makes essential to the excellence (ἀρετην) and proper elevation, even of prose elocution. For, that this is the force of ταπευνη, is clear from his own explanation.

^{* &}quot;Non enim omnia quæ desinunt in v et g sunt masculina; nist ad sensum earum."
rerum quas denotant respicias, qui mas est, licet issa nomina sæminina habeantur." Ed. Cantab. 1785, p. 156.

² Rhet. III. 2, p. 584,

b See Rhet. III. 2, p. 585.

Still, it is obvious to ask, why the philosopher, when his subject was the excellence of poetic diction, should thus set out with a general definition, instead of giving us, at once, the definition of the species.—The reason, I suppose, was, that he conceived the poetic to differ from the rhetorical language, only in the degree of elevation above ordinary speech; and to define degrees is not easy. Nor, indeed, was even this difference common to all Poetry. If the diction of the Dithyrambic and other Lyric kinds, and the Heroic, with their pompous apparatus of compound epithets. foreign and antiquated words, and boldness of metaphor, rose far above the highest elevation of prose diction; on the other hand, that of Tragedy, we know, frequently descended, in its lowest parts, even below what Aristotle assigns as the proper level of rhetorical speech, to a style differing from common speech in no other circumstance but that of metred.—Dacier, with the stiff and inflexible dignity of French Tragedy before his eyes, appears to have been shocked at the expression, μη ταπεινη; for he translates, not the words only, but the ideas, of his author, into French: "La vertu de l'expression consiste dans la netteté et dans LA " NOBLESSE."

N O T E 193.

P. 110. SUCH IS THE POETRY OF CLEOPHON ----.

See NOTE 14. From what Aristotle says of this Poet in the Rhetoric^a, it appears, that he sometimes variegated his vulgarity with a dash of bombast. He gave fine epithets to low words. The ευτελες ονομα, there, agrees with what is said of him here.

^c See the ch. of the Rhet. last referred to.

d See what is faid at the end of this chapter, (cap. xxii.) about the Tragic and other species; and NOTE 209.

^{*} III. 7.—See NOTE 190, p. 448.

What is there faid of Cleophon, La Motte fays of Homer himself.—" Homere emploie quelques les mots les plus vils, et "il les releve aussitôt par des epithetes magnifiques "." It must, indeed, be confessed, that, after all the apologies of critics and commentators, Homer's $\Delta \iota \otimes \iota \varphi \circ \rho \beta \otimes -$ "divine swineherd"—has not, to our ears, a much better effect than $\pi \circ \tau \nu \iota \alpha \sigma \iota \nu \eta$. The only reasonable way of defending Homer, is, surely, to content ourselves with saying, in general, that the expression could not have the same incongruous appearance in Homer's time; as, in that case, he certainly would not have used it. At least, this would be a better apology, than to affert, with Boileau, that $\sigma \iota \rho \beta \omega \tau \eta \varsigma$ is one of the sinest words in the Greek language"."

N O T E 194.

P. 110. AND THAT OF STHENELUS.

This feems to explain a fragment of Aristophanes, in which the Poet, alluding probably to the flatness and insipidity of the diction of Sthenelus, as wanting the poetic seasoning of metaphor, &c. introduces some hungry fellow saying, that "he could make "shift to eat even some of the words of Sthenelus, if they were but dipped in falt, or vinegar."

Difc. fur l'Iliade.

^{*} Reflex. 9, fur Longin.—"Il n'y a peut-être pas dans le Grec deux plus beaux mots que συβωτης & βεκολΦ."—Le Boffu, the admired Le Boffu, apologizes in a different way. The paffage is a morfel of fuch rare and exquifite abfurdity, that I cannot withhold it from the reader. "Nous trouvons de grandes baffeffes dans les termes de chaudrons & de marmites, dans le fang, dans les graiffes, dans les intestins & autres parties des animaux; parceque tout cela n'est plus que dans nos cuifines & dans nos boucheries, & que ces choses nous sont bondir le cœur. Et nous ne premons par garde, que tout cela, au temps d'Homere et de Virgile, etoit au goût du S. Esprit mêm., qui n'a jamais su l'avoir mauvais; que Dieu avoit très-soigneusement [&]quot; ordenné toutes ces choies a Moife," &c. Traite du Poeme Epique, VI. 8.

Κα: πως έγω Σθενελε φαγοιμ' αν ξημα τι, Εις όζος εμβαπτομενον ή λευκες άλας. Αthen. ΙΧ. init.

N O T E 195.

P. 110. AN ÆNIGMA, IF COMPOSED OF METAPHORS-.

"Ut modicus autem atque opportunus ejus usus illustrat ora"tionem, ita, frequens et obscurat et tædio complet; continuus
"verò in allegoriam et ænigma exit."—Quintil. VIII. 6.

N O T E 196.

P. 110. The essence of an Ænigma consists, &c.

I can neither affent to the emendation proposed by Mr. Winftanley, nor see the least want of any emendation. The passage appears to me perfectly clear and unexceptionable, as it is. Τα υπαρχοντα must, by no means, be joined with αδυνατα. It evidently means here, in a sense very usual, things that actually exist—i. e. are true. As, Rhet. II. 25, λυεται δε και τα σημεία,—κ'μν η υπαρχοντα: where, υπαρχοντα is synonymous with αληθες, in lib. i. cap. ii. p. 517—λυτον δε, κ'μν ΑΛΗΘΕΣ η'.

The passage is accurately and closely rendered by Piccolomini.
"La forma e l'essentia dell' enigma consiste in questo, che nel dir "cose, che veramente siano, si congiunghino insieme cose ch' ap"paiano impossibili à star' insieme."—And this is an exact definition of an ænigma—such an ænigma, at least, as Aristotle means. But in the other way of constructing the passage, which is that of Castelvetro, and some other interpreters, it is no definition at all. For if the essence of a riddle consists merely in "putting together things that are incompatible and impossible,"—τα υπαρχουτα αδυνατα, συναθα,— συναψαι—then the Italian Poet made a riddle, when he described a man fighting after he was cut in two:

— — del colpo non accorto,
Andava combattendo, ed era morto *.

N O T E 197.

P. 110. Now this cannot be effected by the mere Arrangement of the words, &c.

κατα μεν εν την των ἐνοματων συνθεσιν.—Ηcinsius—την των ΚΥΡΙΩΝ ἐνοματων—. But the κυριον ἐνομα, as I have already observed, is, throughout, opposed by Aristotle, not to μεταφορα only, but to all the other words. He would hardly, therefore, have used it here in a different sense, as opposed to metaphor only. If any emendation were necessary, I should think ΑΛΛΩΝ ἐνοματων more probable. But perhaps no word is wanting. Aristotle had used the expression, ἀδυνατα ΣΥΝΑΨΑΙ—" to put together things impossible." This might lead to suppose, that an ænigma might be made by the mere συνθεσις ἐνοματων—by a certain arrangement or construction of the words only. Therefore he adds—" this cannot be done by the "mere arrangement of the words; by the metaphorical use of " them it may."

As this fense feems sufficiently clear, supposes no defect in the text, and, after all, coincides, in the main, with that of Heinsius, (for we must necessarily understand, an arrangement of words not metaphorical—) I have adopted it in my translation, after Dacier, and Batteux.

- * Berni, Orlando Innamorato, lib. ii. canto 24, ftanza 60.
- a So, I find, Piccolomini translates: " dell' altre parole."
- b It feems also to result, most naturally, from Aristotle's expression; in which, κατα των 'ΟΝΟΜΑΤΩΝ ΣΤΝΘΕΣΙΝ, and, κατα ΜΕΤΑΦΟΡΑΝ, seem opposed :—" by construction—by metaphor."—If he had written κατα των των ΑΛΛΩΝ (or ΚΥΡΙΩΝ) ότομ, συνθ. he would probably have written also—κατα δε την των μεταφοφΩΝ (sc. συνθεσω.)

N O T E 198.

P. 110. A MAN I ONCE BEHELD, &c.

See Rhet. III. 2, p. 586, where this is called an approved, or admired, riddle:—ἐν τω ἀινιγματι τω ἐυδοκιμεντι—. I wish it may ἐυ-δοκιμεν with a modern reader. In Athenœus another line appears;

Ανδρ' είδον πυρι χαλκον επ' άνερι κολλησαντα, Όυτω συγκολλως ώς ε συναιμα ποιαν. Lib. ix. p. 452.

But Casaubon seems right in supposing this pentameter to have been a modern addition; for it is not found, I believe, in any more antient writer. Even in Plutarch, I observe, that the hexameter not only appears by itself, as in Aristotle, but is plainly given as the whole. See his Symposium, p. 267, ed. H. St. It appears from that passage to have been the production of a lady, Eumetis. I doubt whether, in these "degenerate days," it would have gained her a prize in the Lady's Diary.

The Greeks were fond of these puzzles. The reader may find some curious specimens of this fort of wit in Athenæus, X. 448, &c.

N O T E 199.

P. III. As old Euclid did, objecting, &c.

Fontenelle talks in the same way. "Du tems d'Homere c'étoit une grande merveille qu'un homme pût assujettir son discours à des mesures, à des sillabes longues et breves, & saire en même tems quelque chose de raisonnable. On donnoit donc aux Poetes des licences infinies, & on se tenoit encore trop heureux d'avoir des vers. Homere pouvoit parler dans un seul vers cinq langues d'ifférentes 3

" différentes; prendre le dialecte Dorique quand l'Ionique ne l'ac-

" commodoit pas; au defaut de tous les deux, prendre l'Attique, "l'Eolique, ou le commun; c'est-à-dire, parler en même tems,

" Picara, Gascon, Normand, Breton, & François commun. Il pou-

" voit allonger un mot s'il étoit trop court, l'accourcir s'il étoit trop

" long; personne n'y trouvoit à redirea."

But, could this ingenious and fensible writer feriously suppose, that the language of Homer's poems had at all the same effect to a hearer, or reader, of his time, that an English poem would now have, if composed of all the provincial dialects of Great Britain?

—We are always told, how Homer enriched his language by "visiting all the principal nations of Greece, and learning the "peculiarities of their speech"." Just as if an English poet, because he had resided some time in Yorkshire, or Lancashire, might, in his next poem, put neet for night, loise for lose, or a halliblash, a very well-sounding Lancashire word, for a blaze.

This account makes the language of Homer no other than the nonvious which Quintilian reprobates, among the vitia orationis': fomething worse than the "Babylonish dialect" of Hudibras;

- "a party-colour'd drefs
- " Of patch'd and piebald languages.
- "It had an odd promiscuous tone,
- "As if he'd talk'd three parts in one;
- 2 Digression sur les Anc. et les Mod.
- b Blackwell's Enquiry, &c. p. 292.—And fo, indeed, the author of the treatife De Hom. Poef.—Λεξει δε ποικιλή κεχρημεν. τες άπο πασης διαλεκτε των Ελληνων χαρακτηρας έγκαταμιζεν, έξ ων δηλ. έτι, πασαν μεν Ελλαδα έπελθων και παν έθν.
- " « Κοινισμο quoque appellatur quædam mista ex variâ ratione linguarum oratio; " ut si Atticis Dorica, Ionica, Æolica etiam diela confundas. Cui simile vitium est apud " nos, si quis sublimia humilibus, vetera novis, poetica vulgaribus misceat."

De Infl. Or. VIII. 3, p. 396. ed. Gibs.

Quintilian certainly did not intend this for a description of Homer's language.

- "Which made some think, when he did gabble,
- "They had heard three labourers of Babel;
- "Or Cerberus himfelf pronounce
- "A leash of languages at once."

With such an idea of Homer's language, Fontenelle might well add—"Cette étrange consusion de langues, cet assemblage bisarre" de mots tout désigurés, etoit la langue des dieux; du moins il "est bien sûr que ce n'etoit pas celle des bommes."—And, indeed, I firmly believe with Lord Monboddo, that "fuch a mongrel dia-"lect was never written by any man;" and that "Homer wrote, "either the language that was spoken in the country where he "was born and educated, or that was used by the poets that had "written before him, and was the established language of Poetry"."

N O T E 200.

P. III. AND THEN GIVING A BURLESQUE EXAMPLE OF THAT SORT OF DICTION.

Ιαμβοποιησας εν αυτη τη λεξει.—Two fenses have been given to the word ιαμβοποιησας; both of them, I think, far from satisfactory. Some render it—making Iambic verses: "Iambis usus est." [Viet.] But, is it likely, that Euclid, meaning to ridicule Homer's bexameters, should do it in Iambic verse?—Besides that the lines themselves, such as we find them, have not the least air of Iambics, but fall easily enough, with a little help, into hexameters. In this I persectly agree with Dacier; though I see no reason to suppose with him, that Euclid had composed—"un "ouvrage en vers heroiques."

d Orig. and Prog. of Lang. vol. iii. p. 19.—And see the rational account given of this matter, and of the progress and intermixture of the Greek dialects in general, by Mr. Burgess, in his valuable edition of the Miscell. Crit. of Dawes, Pref. xxi. and p. 405.

Others.

Others, and Madius in particular, understand the word to mean. fatirizing, ridiculing, the Poet;—" fe moque de lui." [Dac.] meaning that, undoubtedly, fuits the passage better; whether it fuits the word itself I much doubt, but will not venture to decide. As Aristotle uses λαμβοποιος, in the sense of a satiric Poet "-a maker of the lambos, or fatiric poem, he may possibly have used the verb, iauβοποιεν, here, in the correspondent sense of making a satire upon, or burlefquing: - ιαμβοποιησας έν αυτη τη λεξει-" having ridiculed him " in that fort of diction," in the following manner, &c .- As this fense appears to me, on the whole, far more eligible than the other, I have followed it: for I fee no third fense that can, with any shew of probability, be extracted from the present text. that it is defective, and that laμβοποιησας is an error, I have very little doubt. If conjecture might be indulged, I should be inclined to suppose, that what Aristotle had said was this; -- "that it is an " easy matter to versity, even in common speech, (ev auth th legel,) if "one may be allowed to extend fyllables and words at pleafure, " fo as to convert, for instance, an Iambic foot, which is continu-"ally occurring in common conversation, into an Heroic or "Spondee." And the examples that follow, were probably two prose fentences so converted, or convertible, into hexameters. But as to the manner in which Aristotle had expressed this in the text. I have no conjecture to offer that is satisfactory, even to myfelf.—Of the mangled lines which follow, with their perplexing variety of indeterminable readings, I shall say with Victorius, " veritate desperată, nihil amplius curæ de hac re suscipere volui." It is some comfort however, as M. Batteux has observed, that both the objection of Euclid, and Aristotle's answer, are clear enough, independently of the examples.

I ought to mention, that Castelvetro has explained this passage, without supposing the text wrong, in a manner different from any other interpreter, and which, in part, accords with my idea. By iamborous he understands neither fatirizing, nor making Iambic verses; but, making Iambic feet instead of spondees, in becameter verse. And the sense he gives the whole passage is this: "It "would be a very easy thing to write beroic verse, if this liberty "of extension were allowed; for then, a Poet might put Iambic "feet in the room of Spondees, and commit no fault, because the short syllables might be lengthened at pleasure." And the lines that follow he supposes to be examples of such desective hexameters.

^a See cap. ix.

Cap. iv.—μαλικα γαρ λεκτικον, &c.

There is fomewhat ingenious in this explanation, as there is in many others of this acute writer; but it has likewise the fault, which many of his explanations have; that of being by no means reconcileable with the original.—See his comment. p. 481.

N O T E 201.

P. III. WHEN THESE LICENCES APPEAR TO BE THUS PURPOSELY USED—.

—Το μεν ἐν ΦΑΙΝΕΣΘΑΙ πως χρωμενον, κ. τ. ἀλ.—The force, both of φαινεσθαι, which I understand to be emphatic here, and of πως, seems perfectly well explained by Castelvetro. "Non so perchè "alcuni vogliano rimuovere di questo testo, πως, essendoci stato "posto per dimostrare, che allora il vitio si scopre, e'l riso si "muove, quando si comincia in alcun modo a riconoscere, che il "poeta ha usata a studio, e ricercata questa maniera di parole." p. 482. So, too, Piccolomini's translation—" l'esser veduto—usar cosi "fatto modo di locutione."—For πως, I once suspected we should read ΑΠΡΕπως; as presently after—χρωμεν ω ἀπρεπως. But I believe πως is right:—aliquo modo.

N O T E 202

P. 111. How great a difference is made, &c.

'Οσον διαφερει—. Not " quantum excellat," as Goulston and others translate; but, " what a difference the proper use of such words makes"—" how different the effect is." As, above, cap. x. ΔΙΑΦΕΡΕΙ γαρ πολυ—" it makes a great difference:" and, cap. xviii. τι ΔΙΑΦΕΡΕΙ.—Nothing more common than this use of the word. The difference here expressed, is, plainly, between the άρμοττον, and the ἀπρεπως, in the use of such words: χρωμεν. ΑΠΡΕΠΩΣ—το ἀυτο ἀν ἀπεργασαιτο. ΤΟ ΔΕ ΑΡΜΟΤΤΟΝ όσον διαφερει—κ. τ. λ.

N O T E 203.

P. III. —AND TEMPERATE USE OF SUCH WORDS

-Εντιθεμενών των ονοματών εις το μετρον:-literally, " the words: " being put into the metre:" i. e. as Victorius and others explain it, "taking care, that, in changing the words, you do it "falvo "metro." A very unnecessary caution surely; besides that the Greek hardly fays that, whatever it may mean. Let us try its meaning by the fairest test, that of strict and literal translation; for we can fometimes fee nonfense in English, which we cannot "But what difference is made by a proper use of fee in Greek. " fuch words, may be observed in hexameter verse, when the words " are put into (i. e. as it is explained, adapted to—) the metre."— What words? - Metaphorical, foreign, extended, &c. of which he had just been speaking. Very well. But how—put in, or adapted to, the metre?—for not a word has yet been faid about changing the words. Goulston understands, putting in these poetical tical words instead of the proper and common words. I see nothing of this in the original.

In short, it appears to me, that nothing tolerable can be made of the phrase, is to perfor, taken in this sense. If it might be taken, as fome have taken it b, adverbially, for perpus, to a moderate degree-all would be well. "Let it be considered in heroic " verse, what a difference is made by such words, when properly " used, and not inserted, or introduced, too frequently." But I cannot think that the expression will admit of this sense, though fomewhat favoured, perhaps, by the circumstance of μετρου having been just before used in the sense of moderation: To de metrou, noivou άπαντων, &c. If the article το were omitted, the adverbial fense would be less improbable; but, εις ΤΟ μετρον, can only, I think, mean—into the metre. Still, however, I incline to think this was Aristotle's meaning, and that he probably wrote is to METPION. A fingle letter makes all the difference. The word μετρίον, as far as that may add any probability to my conjecture, occurs in that part of the Rhetoric where he is treating of the very same subjectthe proper and moderate use of metaphors, epithets, and other tropical and ornamental words, in oratory. Thus, III. 2, p. 586, fpeaking of epithets and diminutives, he says, $i \omega \lambda \alpha \beta \epsilon i \sigma \theta \alpha \epsilon \delta \epsilon \delta \epsilon i$, και παρατηρείν εν αμφοίν ΤΟ METPION. And again, of epithetsδει στοχαζεσθαι ΤΟΥ ΜΕΤΡΙΟΥ. ρ. 587.

As this was the only fatisfactory fense I could make of the words, I have ventured to give it in my version.

² See the notes on his Latin version.

b Castelvetro-Dacier-(" mises avec mesure.") and the editor of the unaccented Ox. ed. of 1760.

N O T E 204.

P. 112. FOR A COMMON AND USUAL WORD-

Kupie είωθοτ . As κυρίον, in Aristotle's sense, is common, the addition of είωθοτ . (usual), seems, at first view, to be mere tautology. But the case, as it is very well explained by Victorius, appears to have been this. The word εσθια, which he here calls κυρίον είωθ . was not strictly κυρίον, but only a common metaphor; that is, a word which, though originally metaphorical, had acquired, by constant use as a chirurgical term *, the effect of a proper word. [See NOTE 179.] As κυρίον, therefore, in Aristotle's enumeration, was opposed to μεταφορα, as well as to γλωττα, and the rest of the poetical words, the application of it here, to a word that was evidently metaphorical in its original use, might seem inconsistent: the word είωθοτ was therefore, probably, added, to obviate, in his short way, this objection.

I cannot guess what induced Dacier to render γλωττων, here, by ω ποτ metaphorique;" or Castelvetro to assert, that Aristotle calls θοινωτωι a foreign word, only on account of the boldness of the metaphor. By γλωττω, I think, we are to understand, any word that belongs either to another language, or another dialest of the same language, and that is not naturalized by common and popular use. For foreign words, by long usage, become common and popular words; like entire, dame, and a great number of other French words in our language, which were γλωττωι when first introduced, and for a considerable time afterwards; but have now, for many years, ceased to be considered as foreign words. Such words in the Greek language Aristotle, I apprehend, did not com-

* Aristotle, probably, would not have given the denomination of nugios, at all, to the same word in this line of Homer:

Τες άμα σοι παντας πυς έσθιει. - Ι. Ψ. 182.

prehend under the term γλωτται, as not being firange, uncommon, $\xi_{ενικα}$. This is evident from a passage in his Rhetoric: αι μεν εν ΓΛΩΤΤΑΙ, ΑΓΝΩΤΕΣ τα δε ΚΥΡΙΑ, ΙΣΜΕΝ .

There is, however, one fort of poetic words not distinctly provided for in Aristotle's enumeration; I mean, obsolete words. Yet these make so considerable a part of the privileged language of verse, that we can hardly suppose him to have overlooked them. Γλωτται seems the only class to which they can possibly be referred: yet his definition of γλωττα is, "a word, ώ χρωνται ΕΤΕΡΟΙ; which is not applicable to an obsolete word, used by nobody. Perhaps he did not think it worth while to distinguish between words belonging to another language, or dialect, and words that once belonged to the native language, but which, having long fallen into disuse, when occasionally revived, the effect of foreign words.

N O T E 205.

P. 112. THE CANKEROUS WOUND THAT EATS MY FLESH.

—Φαγεδαινα ή με σαρκας ἐσθια ποδ. —We should read, probably, for the sake of the metre, either φαγεδαινα γ' ή, as it is corrected in the Oxford Euripides, or, which seems still better, φαγεδαινα δη, which is Du Pauw's emendation. And σαρκας, for the same reafon, must have been altered to σαρκα, in the verse of Euripides, as, I see, it is given in the Oxford edition.

Had Aristotle told us no more about these two lines, than that one of them was of Æschylus, and the other of Euripides, what critic would not have confidently given the θουαται to Æschylus?

Bet. III. 10. init.

N O T E 206.

P. 112. Νυν δε μ' έων ΟΛΙΓΟΣ τε και ΟΥΤΙΔΑΝΟΣ και ΑΚΙΚΥΣ.

Od. IX. 515 .- In the altered line, thus:

Νυν δε μ' έων ΜΙΚΡΟΣ τε και ΑΣΘΕΝΙΚΟΣ και ΑΕΙΔΗΣ.

Among these substituted terms, that une answers to day is clear enough; but how desdy; answers to drinus, it is not easy to make out. This difficulty struck me, long before I had seen the comment of Victorius, who makes the fame remark; and I had accounted for the mistake in the same way that he does: for, if annue be the true reading, the commentators must, probably, have been misled by taking it for granted, that the substituted words must necessarily correspond, in order, as well as meaning, to the original words a. But it is easy to see, that desidnes, ugly, or deformed, cannot answer to ἀκικυς, which is weak; and that ἀσθενικ. does exactly answer to it. 'Ακικυς-'ΑΣΘΕΝΗΣ, αδυνατ . Hesych.-But my difficulty goes still farther. I do not see how deldys can correspond, in meaning, to Eridars. I once thought it should be AΕΙΚΗΣ. — Ουτιδαν<math>Φ — εδενΦ αξιΦ. Ης fych. Αεικελίες — ευτελείς, OYDENOS AZIOYS: and, AEIKES—ETKATAPPONHTON. Id. So Suidas; Λεικελιω - δ ευκαταφρονητω. But, notwithstanding the authority of lexicographers, and the common derivation of the two words, aeings and aeinedis. I question whether the former is ever used by Homer in the sense of gridans, contemptible, mean, &c. though ἀεικελι is. Αεικης feems always to mean, indignus, unworthy, fad, shocking, shameful, &c. It is a word of serious indig-

^{2 — &}quot;Aristotelem, ordinem Homericorum verborum in immutatione corum non a fervasse; asque id secisse, ut metrum servaret; et, quum inquit, ασθευκώ, quod secundum apud ipsum est, tertium apud poetam exprimere voluisse." Vies. Comment. p. 237.

nation.

nation b. Aemedion feems to be used sometimes in that sense, and sometimes in the contemptuous sense, as in the line of Homer which Aristotle next produces. The only passages that I have sound in Homer, where demas will admit well of this sense, are Od. II. 199, and Od. O. 249, in the expressions, demas econo, and, demas economic yet even there, it is not necessary to render it "meanly clad;" it may be, as in other places, sadly, unbecomingly, indigne, &cc.

With respect to the word ἐτιδων, Hesychius gives ἀσθενης as one of its meanings; and ἀσθενης might well enough answer to it here, were it not for the stronger claim of the word ἀκκινς; which, however, after all, may possibly be a mistake. We know how variously Homer was read and quoted by the antients. Three Medicean manuscripts here give ἀειδης, instead of ἀκκινς; and so, the ed. Ald. and the version of Valla. This reading is also mentioned by Eustathius. Perhaps, then, ἀειδης might be the reading of Aristotle's copy—the precious copy ἐκ ναρθηκώ, of which we hear so much; and he might mean to exemplify his proposed experiment of substituting common, for poetical, expression, only in the two sirst words; repeating the last, ἀειδης, merely to complete his verse. But whatever becomes of this conjecture, one thing I cannot help just observing—that this reading, ἀειδης, is favoured by the preceding lines in Homer. Polyphemus says—

Αλλ' αἰει τινα φωτα ΜΕΓΑΝ και ΚΑΛΟΝ ἐδεγμην Ενθαδ' ἐλευσεσθαι, μεγαλην ἐπιειμενον ΑΛΚΗΝ. Νυν δε μ', ἐων ΟΛΙΓΟΣ τε και ΟΥΤΙΔΑΝΟΣ και ΑΚΙΚΥΣ, &c.

v. 513.

One would expect the three words in this last line to answer, as opposites, to great, handsome, and strong, in the two first: which they b Vide indices Homericos.

c As Od. Δ. 244. ξ. 32. θ. 231.

d Ind. Homer.

⁵ See Mr. Winstanley's edition.

will not do, if we read annus; for ετιδαν, though it may very well be opposed to μεγαλην επιειμενον αλκην, cannot be, with any propriety, opposed to καλον. Whereas, if αείδης be substituted for απικυς, all will answer exactly; δλιγω, to μεγαν, ετιδανω, to μεγαλην επιειμενον αλκην, and αείδης, to καλον.

In these examples, it is not always easy to ascertain the particular class, to which Aristotle would have referred the words which he changes. We learn, however, that all these Homeric words were Evina, uncommon, and poetical; and that all the substituted words were nugra—words in common and familiar use.

N O T E 207.

P. 113. For it is this Alone, which cannot be acquired, &c.

Well translated, though very freely, by M. Batteux. "C'est la "feule chose qu'on ne puisse emprunter d'ailleurs. C'est la pro- "duction du génie, le coup-d'ail d'un esprit qui voit les rapports." Compare Rhet. III. 2, p. 585, D. and 11, p. 595, E. where it is observed, that, και ἐν φιλοσοφια, το 'ΟΜΟΙΟΝ, ΚΑΙ ΕΝ ΠΟΛΥ ΔΙΕ- ΧΟΥΣΙ, θεωρειν, ἐυςοχε.—See Mr. Harris's Philol. Inq. p. 186, 187, where all these passages are quoted and translated.

N O T E 208.

P. 113. THE DOUBLE ARE BEST SUITED TO DITHYRAM-BIC POETRY, &c.

-Χεησιμωτατη ή διπλη λεξις τοις διθυραμβοις δυτοι γαρ ψοφωδεις άι δε γλωτται, τοις εποποιοις σεμνου γαρ και αυθαδες ή μεταφορα δε, τοις λαμβειοις. Rbet. III. 3, p. 587.

N O T E 209.

P. 113. But to iambic verse, which is, as much as may be, an imitation of common speech—.

This, as I have already observed, is the only passage in these three chapters concerning the diction, that strictly relates to the subject—the diction of Tragedy, as distinguished from that of the Epic, and other species. It is a hint only; but a pregnant hint, and one that might furnish matter for a dissertation of some length. How frequently, even in the best Tragedies, do we see the Poet, as it were, through the actor; hear him indulging himself in his own language, instead of imitating that of his characters; substituting declamation for passion, describing when he should express ; and, in the unrestrained and epic elevation of his diction, losing all fight of that natural language, of which, undoubtedly, the language of Tragedy should be, according to the precept here implied by Aristotle, only an improved imitation. This improvement, indeed, admits of more or less, but should, at least, bear always the same proportion to what we conceive would be the natural language* of the

- 2 Note 166.
- See Diff. I. p. 18.
- * What I here call natural language is, by no means, confined to fimple and familiar language. See NOTE 226, and Dr. Hurd's note on v. 94 of the Ep. to the Pisos, there referred to. To which I must add the judicious observations communicated to the public, long after this note was written, by Mr. Mason, in his memoirs of Mr. Whitehead, p. 58, 59, 60. I perfectly agree with what is there said—that the Tragic style not only admits, but demands, "the use of strong "images, metaphors, and sigures;" that "it cannot, indeed, be truly impassioned "without them;" and that "while it discards unmeaning epithets, it should be "liberal of those, that add force and vigour to the sentiment." Nor is all this in any degree incompatible with such imitation, such improved imitation, of common so the sentiment.

the persons who speak, in the situation, whatever it may be, of the scene before us. For this last circumstance makes a great difference. Tragedy has its $\alpha_{\rho\gamma\alpha}$ $\mu\epsilon_{\rho\eta}$, its comparatively "idle parts," as well as the Epic Poem"; and, considering how rare the talent is of true poetic fancy, and poetic expression, the critic, who would rigorously exclude them from every part of Tragedy, must be an Ariphrades, or a Euclid.—The first speech of Caractacus, in Mr. Mason's exquisite drama, is highly poetical. Possibly, a severe critic might wish it somewhat less so;—but we have so little of such Poetry!—No Poet, however, knows better than Mr. Mason, when the simpler tone of nature and passion should take place. When Caractacus is exhorted by the Druids to "bethink him"—

— if ought on this vain earth Still holds too firm an union with his foul, Estranging it from peace—

-he answers,

Bear with my weakness, Druid!—This tough breast Must heave a sigh—for she is unreveng'd.

And can I taste true peace, she unreveng'd?

—So chaste, so lov'd a queen!—ah, Evelina,

Hang not thus weeping on the feeble arm

That could not save thy mother.——

The reader will find some excellent observations on this subject in Dr. Beattie's Essay on Poetry, &c. Part II. chap. i. Sect. 1, p. 224, &c. and Sect. 3, p. 267, 268, where a charming example of simple Tragic language is given from Othello⁴.

fpecch, ('ΟΤΙΜΛΑΙΣΤΑ κέξιν μιμεισθαι,) as Aristotle attributes to Tragic diction, which he does not require to be confined to common and ordinary expression, (μυςια,) but expressly allows it to use aiso metaphors, and epitheis: το πυςιου, παι ΜΕΤΑΦΟΡΑ, παι ΚΟΣΜΟΣ. cap. xxii.

- · Cap. xxiv. Transl. Part III. Seel. 6.
- d In his note, Dr. Beattie has "translated it into the finical style." But we see plainly, that he is by much too good a Poet to succeed well in spoiling good Poetry.

With

With respect to the Greek Tragedy, its earliest language appears to have been of a low and burlesque kind—the λεξις γελοια of its satyric origin, conveyed in the suitable vehicle of the dancing tetrameter. When it was reformed and dignified, (ἀπεσεμνωθη,) Homer was the model; and Æschylus, with a conception naturally sublime, and the Iliad before him, raised the tone of Tragedy above its proper pitch, not only to the pomp of the Epic, but even, frequently, to the wild, and tumid, and dark audacity of the Dithyrambic: so that, sometimes, as extremes will meet, the λεξις γελοια, which he took so much pains to avoid, came round and met him, in the shape of bombast, at the very moment when he thought himself at the greatest distance from it. There could not well be any thing in the theatrical cart of Thespis more laughable, than to call smoke "the brother of sire," and dust, the "brother "of muds."

Sophocles reduced the general language of his dialogue to a more equable and fober dignity, but still, Homer, we know, was his great model⁵; and of his diction it may, perhaps, be said, that it is often Epic, though his measure is Iambic. Most modern Quando la brina in su la terra assempra L'imagine di fua forella bianca. Inferno, Canto xxiv. v. 4, 5.

e Cap. iv. Transl. Part I. Sect. 7.

^{*} Πυς Φ κασιν. Sept. contra Theb. v. 500.—κασις πηλε---πονις. Agam. 503.—The commentators are very amufing, when they admire this, and tell us, it is the fame thing as the beautiful expression of χευσεας τικνον ἐλπιδ Φ, applied to the Oracle, in the Oedipus of Sophocles, [v. 161], the παμφορε γαιας τικνα of Æschylus, applied to flowers [Pers. 620.] or the "Sylvæ filia nobilis," of Horace. [See Burton's Pentalogia, and Stanley's notes on Æschylus.] De Pauw, indeed, finds fault; but he is equally diverting in another way. His note upon κασις πηλε, is—"Inepte: pulvis ille est ipsum lutum arefactum et comminutum: oculati vident statim."—It is to be observed, that both these metaphors of Æschylus are in the dialogue part. Dante has a riddling metaphorical expression of the same kind, but much more poetical. He calls a hoar frost, the sister of snow.

ε Όμηςον μεν, Σοφοκλεα επικον, Σοφοκλεα δε, Όμηςον τραγικον. Suidas, v. Polemon. Diog. Laert. IV. 20.—το παν Όμηςικος ώνομαζε. Auctor Vita Sophaclis.

readers, however, will, I believe, think it, (as we are told many antient readers did h,) more adapted to the genius of Tragedy than that of Euripides; who feems to have been regarded by the antients as the first who brought down the language of Tragedy into unifon with the measure, so that the one bore the same degree of refemblance to common speech in its expressions, as the other did in its rbythm. At least, this appears to have been Aristotle's opinion, from a paffage in his Rhetoric, where, after having explained the difference between the diction of Oratory and that of Poetry, and the foundation of that difference, he observes, that such a degree of embellishment as forces on the hearer the idea of art, and labour, and preparation, is to be avoided, not only by the Orator, but even by the Poet, if he would be natural and affecting: and he compares fuch evidently artificial language to the voices of the generality of actors, as opposed to the voice of Theodorus, which always appeared to be the real voice of the character he personated; whereas their voices were evidently seigned i. then adds-" The best way to conceal artifice, and make your " language appear easy and natural, is, by forming it, chiefly, of "the words and phrases of customary speech, properly selected; as "Euripides does, who first set the example"."

A passage, that precedes this, deserves to be given entire, from its close connection with the subject of this part of the treatise on Poetry, and the curious, though short, sketch it contains of the bishory of Tragic diction.

h Namque is, (Euripides,) et in fermone (quod ipsum reprehendunt quibus gravitas et cothurnus et sonus Sophoclis videtur esse sublimior,) magis accedit oratorio generi. — Quintil. X. 1.

i See Diff. I. p. 41. in the note.

 $[\]mathbf{k} = \delta$ ει λαιθανείν ποιμντας, και μη δοκείν λεγείν πεπλασμένως, άλλα πεφυκότως τέτο γας πίθα- \mathbf{k} ν έκεινο δε, τ'εναυτιοι = , και όιον ή Θεοδως φωνή πεπονθε προς την των άλλων ϋποκριτών ή μεν γας, τε λεγοντ $\mathbf{\Theta}$ έοικεν έιναι, αι δ'άλλοτριαι. κλεπτεται δ'ευ, έαν τις έκ της έιωθυιας διαλεκτε έκλεγων συντίθη $\mathbf{\hat{c}}$ όπις Ευριπίδης ποιεί, ΚΑΙ ΥΠΕΔΕΙΞΕ ΠΡΩΤΟΣ. Rhet. III. 2. p. 585. B.

"As the Poets appeared to owe their reputation to their lan-" guage, which never failed to be admired, however foolith and "abfurd the matter it conveyed; on this account, even profe "diction was, at first, poetical, like that of Gorgius. And even " now, they, who use such language, are looked upon, by illite-"rate people, as the finest speakers; which is far from being "true; for oratorical diction, and poetical diction, are different "things. And as a proof of this, we fee what has actually hap-" pened: for now, even among the Poets themselves, those who "write Tragedy no longer make use of that fort of language; "but, as they had exchanged the Trochaic verse for the Iambic, "because this, of all metres, approaches the nearest to common " fpeech; fo now, they have also discarded all those words and " phrases, so remote from common speech, with which the earlier "Tragic Poets used to embellish their diction, and which are still "employed by those who write Hexameters. It would be ridi-"culous, therefore, to imitate the Poets in a language, which "they themselves have abandoned as improper!."

The Abbé Batteux, by understanding ἐαμβειοις here to mean Iambic, or satirical, Poems, has, unluckily, thrown away the only passage in these three chapters, that was strictly to Aristotle's purpose. He has, also, with Dacier, misrepresented his meaning, by rendering—" ne peut recevoir que ce qui est employé dans la con- "versation." We are, undoubtedly, to understand, ΜΑΛΙΣΤΑ είμοττει, as before: for that Aristotle did not mean absolutely to exclude the other Poetic words—the double, the foreign, &c. from every part of the Tragic dialogue, is plain from his allowing the occasional use of them even in prose. Rhet. III. 2, p. 585, C. 7. p. 590, E. 591, A.

^{1 —} ἐπει δε ὁι ποινται, λεγοντες ἐυνθη, δια την λεξιν ἐδονεν πορισασθαι τηνδε την δοξαν δια τετο, ποιντική πρωτή ἐγενετο λεξις, ὁιον ἡ Γοργιε και νυν ἐτι ὁι πολλοι των ἀπαιδευτών τες τριετες ὁιονται διαλεγεσθαι καλλικά. Τετο δε ἐκ ἐςιν, ἀκλ ἐτεςα λογε και ποιησεως λεξις ἐτι. Δηλοι δε το συμβαινον ἐδε γαρ ὁι τας Τραγωδίας ποιεντες ἐτι χρωνται τον ἀυτον τροποι· ἀλλ ἀσπερ και ἐκ τετραμμετρων ἐις το ἰαμβειον μετεβησαν, δια το τω λογω τετο των μετρων ὁμοιοτατον ἐιναι των ἀλλων ἔτω και των ἀνοματων ἀφηκασιν, όσα παρα την διαλεκτον ἐςιν ὁις δ'ὁι πρωτον ἐκοσμεν, και ἐτι νυν ὁι τα ἐξαμετρα ποιεντες, ἀφηκασι. [The repetition of ἀφηκασι, here, has much the appearance of error. I suspect we should read thus: ἐτω και των ὀνοματων, ὁσα παρα την διαλεκτον ἐςιν, ὁις Τ' ὁι πρωτον ἐκοσμεν και—ποιεντες, ἀφηκασι.] διο γελοιον μιμεισθαι τετες, ὁι ἀυτοι ἐκ ἐτι χρωνται ἐκεινω τω τροπφ. Rhet. III. 1. p. 584.

N O T E 210.

P. 115. Even in this, therefore, &c.

Hon και ταυτη.—Hon—already—even in the first operation of his genius—the very choice of his subject, and formation of his plan. Such appears to me to be the force of ηδη in this passage, which, I think, is injured by those commentators who punctuate—ωσπερ επομεν ηδη—" as we have already said."

N O T E 211.

P. 115. He has, from the rest, introduced many Episodes—.

Nov δε, έν μες απολαβων, ἐπεισοδιοις κεχρηται ΑΥΤΩΝ πολλοις.—
i. e. as the commentators explain it, of the other parts of the war. But, what should we think of this English—" Selecting "one part of the war, he introduces many episodes of them?" If Aristotle meant the other parts of the war, ἀυτων must, surely, be wrong: if ἀυτων be right, I confess I cannot see what he meant. I wish we had manuscript authority for the ἀυτΟΥ of Heinsius, which is adopted and explained by Le Bossu, II. 5, and 6.—But a learned friend has suggested to me a conjecture still more probable; that Aristotle wrote ΑΛΛΩΝ. Νυν δε, ΈΝ μες απολαβων, ἐπεισοδιοις κεχρηται ΑΛΛΩΝ [sc. μερων] πολλοις. "Selecting one part "only of the war, he has, from other parts, introduced many "Episodes," &c.

N O T E 212.

P. 115. THE AUTHOR OF THE CYPRIACS, AND OF THE LITTLE ILIAD.

To the authors usually referred to on the subject of these Poems, it may now be useful to add Heyne, Excursive prime ad Æn. II. p. 228, 229—a very learned and curious differtation concerning the writers on the Trojan war.

N O T E 213.

P. 116. THE FALL OF TROY.

See Heyne, Excursu primo ad An. II. p. 230, 231.

N O T E 214.

P. 116. Homer gave both the first, and the most perfect, example.

'Oις άπασιν Όμης κεχεηται, KAI πεωτ , KAI ίκανας. " Neque " quemquam alium, cujus operis primus auctor fuerit, in eo per-" feetissimum, præter Homerum, et Archilochum, reperiemus." Vell. Paterculus, I. 5.

Victorius, and other commentators, have, I think, done some injustice to the force of Aristotle's expression here, by taking the adverb, inavue, too literally. They render it—" ita ut satis putari "debeat." (Vist.)—" accurate satis." (Goulston.) &c.—This gives the word, indeed, but salls short of the meaning, which Castel-vetro alone has, according to my idea, adequately expressed: "Gran lode è quella, che è data da Aristotele ad Homero, che "egli sia stato il primo, che abbia usate tutte e quattro le spetie "dell' Epopea, &c.—e le habbia usate bene & persettamente." And his translation is—"Le quali cose tutte Homero usò, e pri"miero, e persettamente." Undoubtedly, the literal meaning of inavas is, sufficiently well; but in Poetry nothing is sufficiently well, that is not as well, or nearly as well, as possible: and, farther, if I am not mistaken, the Greek writers, not unfrequently, use inave, and inavas, as the Italians use the word assat in sometimes for enough, (which, I suppose, is the primary signification of assat,) and sometimes for much, a great deal, very, &c. 'Inavay—aquesay, MOAAHN. Hesych.

N O T E 215.

P. 117. If the Epic Poem were reduced from its antient length, so as not to exceed that of such a number of Tragedies as are performed successively at one hearing.

If we knew certainly, how many Tragedies were performed at one hearing, (ἐις μιαν ἀκροασιν,) we should know, with equal certainty, to what length Aristotle thought the Epic Poem ought to be reduced, in order to be perfectly, or sufficiently, ἐυσυνοπτον. But, unfortunately, the premises here are not less obscure than the conclusion; the information to be picked up in antient authors, relative to the Tragic contests and the Tetralogiæ, being extremely imperfect and unsatisfactory. Let us however try, what little glimmering of light may be thrown upon this subject, from those authors, or from the nature of the thing-itself.

The general principle, upon which Aristotle here fixes the length of an Epic Poem, is the same with that, upon which hefixes the length of a Tragedy: viz. "that it should be such as to "admit of our comprehending, at one view, the beginning and "the end. And this," he goes on, "would be the case, were it reduced from its antient length, so as not to exceed that of such a number of Tragedies, as are performed successively at one hearing." Here then is a rule, which, at the time he wrote it, was as clear and determinate, as if he had expressly said, that an Epic Poem ought not to exceed a certain number of verses. But, as an ingenious friend has suggested to me, "he probably chose to put his rule in the way he has put it, rather than in this latter way, as wishing to convey an intimation, that the length of an Epic Poem should be such, as would admit of its being fairly recited, or read, in a single day."

It feems to have been a commonly received opinion, that the four dramas of each Poet, which composed the Tetralogia, were always performed at one hearing—in one day*. In this case, if one Poet only produced his Tetralogia, there could be but four Tragedies; if two, there must be eight; if three, twelve, and so on: there could be no intermediate numbers. In so obscure a fubject, I certainly shall not take upon me to decide. The passage, however, commonly adduced, I believe, as the principal authority in this matter, from Diogenes Laertius, appears to me to be against this supposition. The words are these: Εκεινοι [sc. Tragici] τετρασι δραμασιν ήγωνιζοντο, Διονυσιοις, Ληναιοις, Παναθηναιοις, Χυτροις, ών το τεταρτον ην σατυρικον· τα δε τεττερα δραματα έκαλειτο Τετραλογια .--Here are four festivals, and four dramas; and the most obvious meaning of the passage, surely, is, that each contending Poet produced, not his entire Tetralogia at the fame festival, but one Tragedy only at each different festival. And so Is. Casaubon appears to have understood it. " Quot Athenis Liberalia agitabantur, tot fabulas di-

^{*} See Dacier, p. 118.

² Diog. Lacrt. III. 56.

" versas a Tragicis Poetis doceri folitas legimus"." But it seems difficult to reconcile this account with what is generally, I think, faid, and what Cafaubon himfelf has elsewhere faid, of the fatyric piece; viz. that it was played between, or after, the serious Tragedies, on each festival, by way of relaxation and relief. For, to fay, that of the four dramas exhibited by each Poet on the four different festivals, the fourth was a satyric drama, (wu to TETAP-TON ήν σατυρικον,) is to fay, pretty plainly, that all the fatyric pieces were performed together at the fourth and last festival, the Xutpoi. And so indeed some commentators seem to have understood it d. Perhaps the matter might, not unreasonably, be compromised, by fupposing the rule, in fact, to have been, that, of the different Poets contending on each day, one should always produce the fatyric drama of his Tetralogia, and that drama always close the exhibition of the day.—But I forbear to indulge conjecture farther upon this dark subject. Let us return to Aristotle and his rule.

Dacier tells us, very gravely, that twelve, and sometimes fixteen, Tragedies were performed in one day : an account, which, upon the very face of it, exceeds all bounds of probability. It is rather difficult to conceive, that the representation of a single Tragedy could take up less time than three hours. If however we suppose it to have taken up only two, and also, what could hardly be the case, that Tragedy succeeded Tragedy without any intermission, just b De Satyr. Græc. Poef. lib. i. cap. 5.

c Ib. cap. iii. p. 128.

d'Abstris] Genus hoc certaminis fatyrici fuit, ut ex Lacrtii verbis apparet, in quo, dramate satyrorum proprio certaretur. Dio. Lacrt. ed. Mib. III. 56, note 205.

^{*} P. 118, note 15.—This reminds one of the account given of Chinese plays, "dont la representation dure dix ou douze jours de suite, en y comprenant la nuit, "jusqu' à ce que les spectateurs & les acteurs las de se succéder éternellement, en allant boire, manger, dormir, & continuer la piece, ou assister au spectacle, sans que rien y soit interrompu, se retirent ensin tous, comme de concert." Brumoy, Theatre des Grees, I. 53.

as scene succeeded scene in the same piece, the whole exhibition of the day, according to Dacier's lowest statement, would have taken up 24, and according to his highest, 32 hours. But is it conceivable, that any audience, however intemperate their fondnefs for this amufement, could fit fo many hours together to hear Tragedies, and to hear them attentively, so as to judge of, and decide upon, their comparative merits?—This account, therefore, of Dacier, that, the number of Tragedies performed "at one "hearing," and to the same audience, (for that is implied,) amounted to twelve, we may venture at once to reject as the most palpable impossibility. Shall we then suppose eight, the next lowest number possible, on the supposition, that the four dramas of the Tetralogia were exhibited in one day? The representation of eight Tragedies, we may venture to fay, could not possibly take up less time than fixteen hours. Let any man conceive himself fitting in a Theatre, and hearing Tragedy after Tragedy, from fix o'clock in the morning till ten at night, and then pronounce as to the probability of even this supposition. If we reject this number, and still adhere to the common notion of these exhibitions, we shall be reduced to a single Tetralogia; in which case there can have been no rival exhibition on the fame day. It feems therefore impossible to adjust this matter in any reasonable way, without fupposing, that the four dramas of the Tetralogia were exhibited on different festivals: a supposition, I think, fairly deducible from the passage of Diog. Laertius above quoted. A supposition too, which feems to be rendered more probable from the very nature of rival exhibitions; as each contending Poet would then produce his drama at the same hearing, each hearing would be a distinct day of contest, and there would be, at each contest, a sufficient ground of judgment upon the comparative merits of each perform-This idea will allow us to affign about twelve hours, as the utmost time taken up by the whole exhibition of the day; and the great difference of length, which we observe in the Greek Tragedies gedies that are extant, will also allow us to conclude, that, occafionally, five, or possibly even fix Tragedies, might be brought within that compass, or nearly so. On this ground, then, it will appear, I believe, that the extent, to which Aristotle proposed to limit the Epic Poem, could hardly exceed that of about 7000 lines.

But, if we admit this, we must of course admit, that he meant to include the Poems of Homer in the number of those which he regarded as too long. And that he did so mean, however unwilling Dacier and other commentators are to allow it, I have no doubt. For, 1. The actual length of those Poems seems sufficiently to prove this. The number of lines in the Iliad is nearly 15,000; in the Odyssey, nearly 12,000. Now whoever can believe it possible, that an audience could sit, and make a common practice of sitting, 22, or even 18 hours together, to hear Tragedies, (which, at the lowest allowance, of two hours only for the performance of each piece, must have been the case, if Homer's Poems sell within Aristotle's rule,) may believe, that he thought those Poems of a proper length. Dacier, indeed, tells us, that even the Iliad may be read through in a single day. For a wager, indeed, I will not say what might be done, if we had reading races

- f Sec NOTE 64, p. 268. There are not 1100 verses in any of the seven Tragedies of Æschylus, except the Agamemnon. Some of those of Euripides sall short of 1200 lines: e. g.—the Alcestis, Heraclidæ, Rhesus. Several are within 1300. It should also be considered, that the satyric dramas, which probably closed the entertainment of the day, were, perhaps, considerably shorter than the serious Tragedies, as is the case with our farces; at least, if we may judge from the only drama extant of the kind, the Cyclops of Euripides, in which there are but 709 verses.
- t Beni and Piccolomini are of my opinion. See their commentaries. Victorius, too, though by agrain he understands the Poets before Homer's time, yet, by his explanation of Aristotle's rule, plainly supposes Homer to be glanced at; for he makes the time, allowed by the critic for the recitation of an Epic Poem, to be only eight hours. P. 250.
- » _ "L'Iliade, l'Odysse, & l'Eneïde, sont entierement consormes à la regle d'Aristote: elles peuvent être leuës chacune dans un seul jour." P. 415.

at Newmarket. But, 2. Had Aristotle meant to except Homer, why not expressly except him? Gladly as he appears to seize every opportunity of giving the Poet his just praise, would he not, here also, have opposed his conduct to that of other Poets, as he has done in fo many other instances? Or why, indeed, refer us to the number of Tragedies fuccessively performed in one day, when he might as well have referred at once to the Iliad, or the Odyffey? All this feems to leave no doubt, that he thought those Poems drawn out to too great a length. And this is also conformable to what he afterwards fays, of the advantage which the Tragic has above the Epic Poem in this circumstance, that it effects its purpose " in a shorter compass"—εν ελαττονι μηκει. I do not forget what he had faid in the preceding chapter—that if Homer had taken the whole war for his subject, his Poem would not have been έυσυνοπτον: which, it may be urged, implies, that he thought it was ἐυσυνοπτον as Homer had managed it, and therefore not too long. But the contradiction here is merely apparent. The ¿υσυνοπτον admits of degrees; and all that Aristotle appears to mean, in the passage before us, is, that the Poems of Homer would have been more ἐυσυνοπτα, and, in that respect, more perfect, had they been shorter.

But, to return once more to the dramatic exhibitions—the time of twelve hours feems to be the very utmost that can reasonably be allowed, and is more, I believe, than will readily be allowed, without considering the particular character of the Athenians, and the circumstances attending these theatrical exhibitions. The intemperate fondness of that people for these amusements is well known; and Aristotle himself gives us a pretty strong picture of it, when he says, though only in the way of hyperbolical supposition, "if A HUNDRED Tragedies were to be exhibited in concurrence." We must, also, consider the variety of subjects in the different Tragedies performed, and, indeed, the variety refulting from the very nature of the Greek drama, with its choral troop, its odes, its accompaniments of music and dance: the relief, also, of the fatyric drama, which closed the performance by way of Farce; the pleasure of comparing the rival Poets and actors, the zeal of party in favour of this, or that, particular Poet or performer, &c.—And we may add to all this a curious circumstance in the dramatic history of the Greeks; that the people never sate active beapeures, but eat, and drank, and regaled themselves with cakes, and nuts, and wine, during the performance, like an English audience at Sadler's Wells, or Bartholomew Fair.

^{*} Cap. ult.—The proverbial expression, μανροτεςου ΙλιαδΦ, is well known.

^{*} Part II. Seel. 4. - Orig. cap. vii. See NOTE 64.

In the whole theatrical fystem of the antients, and every thing relating to it, all seems to have been proportionably vast, extravagant, and gigantic. Their immense theatres, their colossal dresses, the stilts, buskins, or heroic pattens, on which the actor was mounted, their masks that covered the whole head, their loud, chanting, and speaking-trumpet declamation.—all this is upon the same scale with the intemperate eagerness of the people for these amusements, the number of Tragedies exhibited in one day, and, we may add, the almost incredible number said to have been written even by their best Poets.—Would not this last circumstance alone, supposing not a single drama to have been preserved, have surnished a reasonable proof, à priori, or, at least, a strong presumption, that the Greel: Tragedy must have been, in many respects, a simple, unequal, impersect thing, just such as, in fact, and prejudice apart, we ¹ See Athen. p. 464, F. and Cafaul. Animadvers. p. 779, and the passage there cited from Aristotle's Ethic. Nicom.

The reader will find a curious description of the dress and figure of the antient Tragic actors in Lucian's treatise De Salt. p. 924. ed. Ben. and De Gymnas, p. 406, 415. But he will allow something for the exaggerations of a man of humour. See, 216, the Gallus, p. 263.

ⁿ See Dr. Burney's High, of Music, I. p. 154, and Ph. IV. Fig. 1, 2, 3.

find it to be°? Sophocles, confessedly the most correct and polished of the three great Tragic Poets, is said to have written above an bundred Tragedies P.

N O T E 216.

P. 117. For, in this respect also, the narrative imitation is abundant, and various, beyond the rest.

Περιττη γαρ και ή διηγηματικη μιμητις των άλλων.—περιττη is rendered, by almost all the commentators, eximia, præstantior, more excellent, than the other imitations; which makes Aristotle directly contradict himself. And this Victorius allows, at the same time that he adheres to that fense:—" præstantiorem esse [hanc poesin] " inter cæteras, et altiorem locum tenere." How this can be reconciled with the critic's decided preference of Tragedy in the last chapter, I do not see. I believe Dacier is right, in giving to -περιττη, in this passage, the sense of, more abundant—la plus excessive de toutes^a. The text, however, appears to me to be defective: for what becomes of the nai, which Dacier, and other translators, have been forced to neglect? The only fair version of the passage, as we now read it, is this:—" for the narrative imitation ALSO. is more abundant, &c. KAI ή διηγ. μιμ.—of which I can make no reasonable sense. Farther, some word seems wanting, to express in what the Epic is megitty; and this Dacier found himself obliged to supply in his translation and note: en cela la plus exceffive -. I cannot, therefore, help suspecting, that THTOIS [sc. ξενικοις ονομασι], or rather ταυτη, has been omitted; and that we should read thus—περιττη γαρ, και ΤΑΥΤΗι, ή διηγηματικη μιμησις των

[°] See NOTE 33.

P 123: See Suidas. Fabric. Bib. Græc.—Casaub. in Athen. p. 496.

² The same sense is given to the word by Robortelli; but he understands περιττη των ἀλλων—abundant in other things also: a sense which, I believe, the phrase will not bear; besides that, for this purpose, the και should be otherwise placed—και των ἀλλων, αλλων . " In this respect too"—alluding to the several other respects mentioned in this chapter, in which the Epic imitation was περιττη των άλλων: as, in the time of its action, and the length of the Poem itself; in its Episodes, and the variety and μεγαλοπρεπεια arising from them, and from the admission of contemporary events; in the degree, also, to which it admits of the wonderful, and even the incredible. This, also, agrees perfectly with what he had said, cap. xxii. και ἐν μεν τοις ἡρωικοις ΑΠΑΝΤΑ χρησιμα τα ἐιρημενα.

N O T E 217.

P. 117. HAVE MORE MOTION.

Κινητικα. The scruple of Victorius, who proposed to read κινητα, from a doubt, whether κινητικα would admit of a passive sense, seems to have been ill-sounded. The passage in Plutarch, De primo frigido, referred to by Goulston in his note, is this: ως βραδεια και ΣΤΑΣΙΜΟΣ [αντικειται] προς οξυβροπον και ΚΙΝΗΤΙΚΟΝ. p. 1755, ed. H. S. But the word is used in the same sense by Aristotle himself, in the 50th of the Harmonic Problems, p. 770, where κινητικω is applied to the acuter sound of a concord, on account of the velocity of its vibrations, and opposed to ήρεμαιω, by which he characterizes the graver sound.

N O T E 218.

P. 117. THE OTHER, ADAPTED TO ACTION AND BUSINESS.

Поактіков. — See NOTE 45, p. 234.

So above, cap. xxiii.—ΚΑΙ ΤΑΥΤΗι θεσπεσι Φ άν φανειη Ομης Φ παρα τες άλλες.

E See what presently follows in this chapter: Part III. Seel. 4. of the translation.

N O T E 219.

P. 118. THE POET, IN HIS OWN PERSON, &c.

The reader may compare Plato's account of Homer, De Rep. lib. iii. p. 393, ed. Serr. p. 178, ed. Massey.

N O T E 220.

P. 118. BUT EPIC POETRY----ADMITS EVEN THE IMPROBABLE AND INCREDIBLE, FROM WHICH THE HIGHEST DEGREE OF THE SURPRISING RESULTS, BECAUSE, THERE, THE ACTION IS NOT SEEN.

Δει μεν ἐν ἐν ταις Τραγωδιαις ποιεν το θαυμαςον μαλλον δ' ἐνδεχεται ἐν τη ἐποποιία το ἀλογον, δι ὁ συμβαινει μαλιςα το θαυμαςον, δια το μη όραν ἐις τον πραττοντα.—Such is the reading which I have followed. The fenfe, which I have given it, accords very nearly, if not exactly, with that given by Victorius and Goulston, and adopted by Dacier and M. Batteux^a. Victorius supports his emendation—AΛΟΓΟΝ, instead of ἀναλογον—by reasons of considerable cogency: νία. the difficulty, or, rather, the impossibility, of making any satisfactory sense of το ἀναλογον, as the rest of the passage stands^b; the a — "Mais encore plus dans l'Epopée, qui va en cela jusq' au deraisonnable; car, "comme dans l'Epopée on ne voit pas les personnes qui agissent, tout ce qui passe les "bornes de la raison est trés propre à y produire l'admirable & le merveilleux." Dacier. — "L'Epopée, pour étonner encore plus, va jusq' à l'incroyable; parce que ce "qui se fait chez elle n'est point jugé par les yeux." — Batteux.

b If ἀνανεγον be right, it can be understood no otherwise, I believe, than adverbially—ἀνανεγως—in proportion; as it has been understood by those commentators who have adhered to that reading. But, in proportion to what? Cuffelvetro explains it 3 Q 2 the explanatory instance itself, which immediately follows, and is, plainly, an instance of the αλογον, and even expressly called γελοιον, ridiculously improbable; and the similar instance, presently after given, of the landing of Ulysses in the Odyssey, which he expressly calls, τα εν Οδυσσεια ΑΛΟΓΑ, &c.

But, though I think the fense of the passage, thus read, and thus explained, is, in itself, unexceptionable, yet I can by no means rely with perfect confidence upon the reading from which it is obtained. All the manuscripts, it seems, give, with one consent, ANAAOFON. This circumstance, in a passage not free, in other respects, from suspicion, should be sufficient to prevent our admitting the emendation of Victorius, however probable, without some reserve-" expectandi codices." I should perhaps, therefore, have done better, had I omitted the doubtful part of the passage—the words, το αναλογον, διο μαλιςα συμιβαινει το θαυμαςον: for the omission will leave a clear and complete fense; and, moreover, a fense, in which the only meaning that can well be given to the words omitted, seems, in fact, to be implied. Δει μεν έν εν ταις τραγωδιαις στοιειν το θαυμαςον μαλλον δ' ένδεχεται έν τη έποποιία,——δια το μη όραν εις τον πραττοντα. "The furprifing is necessary in Tragedy: but "the Epic Poem admits of it to a greater degree, --- because, "there, the action is not feen."

thus: "Ma, se st conviene fare la maraviglia nella Tragedia, molto più si conviene, "ed é licito, à sarla nell' epopea secondo proportione. Quasi dica—se in una attione "ristretta al termino d'un giorno, & allo spatio d'un palco, [of a stage,] si sa mara- "viglia, che sia d'un grado, si dovrà sare in attione che sia, pogniamo, di trentasette "giorni, e avenuta in mare & in terra, quale è l'attione compresa nell' Odissia, secondo "proportione, di trenta & sette gradi:—&, το ἀναλογον, è detto averbialmente, come se "fosse, ἀναλογως, p. 549.—I know not how the reader will relish this Rule of Three explanation.—But what is to be made of the δω, which follows?—" Wherefore [i. c. lecause the Epic is more capable of the surprising than Tragedy] συμβαίνει μαλίσα το καυμασι —" the surprising occurs, or is to be sound, most in the Epic Poeni, because "there the action is not seen."—I see no other fair translation of the passage, according to the o'd reading.

N O T E 2214

P. 119. Achilles making signs, &c.

The passage is this:

Λαοισιν δ'ANENEYE ΚΑΡΗΑΤΙ διώ Αχιλλευς, Ουδ' εία εμεναι επι Έκτορι πικρα βελεμνα, Μη τις κυδώ άροιτο βαλων, ο δε δευτερώ ελθοι.

Il. 22. 205.

N O T E 222.

P. 119. It consists in a sort of sophism, &c.

In the words, δι ὁ δη ἀν—to προσθειναι, inclusively, the text seems evidently mangled beyond all hope of conjectural restoration. This ulcus infanabile I presume not to touch, either as commentator, or as translator. I can make nothing consistent of it mysels: I have seen nothing consistent made of it by others.

The words, τυτο δε ἐςτ ψευδω, are ambiguous. Victorius doubts, whether they mean, "this posterior fact is false," (the τοδι γινεται,) or, "this conclusion is false"—namely, ἐι το ὑςερον ἐςτ, και το προτερον ἐναι. What follows, had it been tolerably clear, would, probably, have fixed the sense of ψευδω. As this is not the case, I have given it that sense which appears to me most obvious; and I think I am warranted by the very same expression used in the same sense, in the Rhetoric, II. 23, p. 579, A, where, ἐςτ δε τυτο ψευδω, clearly means, this is a salse conclusion.

But the most important question is, in what manner Aristotle meant to apply this logical paralogism to Homer's management of siction. None of the commentators, whom I have seen, appear to me to have given any satisfactory explanation.

The paralogism παρ ἐπομενον, à consequenti, here alluded to, the reader will find clearly explained in several parts of the philosopher's other works. It consists in taking a proposition as convertible, that is not so. Because rain wets the ground, we conclude, when we see the ground wet, that it must have rained. Because every man in a sever is hot, we conclude, that a person who is hot must be in a sever: ἀναγκη ΚΑΙ τον θερμον πυρεττειν. These are some of Aristotle's own explanatory instances.—Now, he tells us here, that Homer's art of hying—ψενδη λεγκιν ως δει—consists in imposing his marvellous sictions upon the reader's imagination by a fort of poetic sophism, similar to this logical sophism. And this is all he says. He has left us to make out the similitude as well as we can. No writer, I believe, ever paid more frequent compliments of this kind to the sagacity of his readers.

Dacier, with other commentators, seems to understand nothing more, than that artful intermixture of historical, or acknowledged, truth, which, by throwing the mind, as it were, into a posture of belief and conviction, has its effect even upon what we know to be seigned, and makes the salse pass glibly with the true. But I cannot think, that this comes up to Aristotle's meaning, nor that his observation, here, amounts only to that of Strabo:—in understand has attempted to shew, and I believe no one can shew, bow that, which Aristotle says of the particular paralogism denominated $\pi\alpha\varrho'$ increases, is applicable to the intermixture—the mere juxtaposition, of sact and siction.

The fimilitude of the logical and poetic fophifin appears to me to be this. It is not merely, that, where there is a mixture of history

² Tom. I. p. 286, A, and B. Sect. 6, 7, 8.—Rhet. II. 24, p. 580, E. ed. Duval.

h Tom. I. ubi supra.

[·] Lib. I .- And fee Dacier's note, p. 427.

and fiction, the truth makes the fiction pass; but the comparison, I think, relates to the connection between the fictions of the Poet, confidered as cause and effect, as antecedent and consequent. Poet invents certain extraordinary characters, incidents, and fituations. When the actions, and the language, of those characters, and, in general, the confequences of those events, or situations, as drawn out into detail by the Poet, are fuch as we know, or think, to be true—that is to fay, poetically true, or natural; fuch, as we are fatisfied must necessarily, or would probably, follow, if such characters and fituations actually existed; this probability, nature, or truth, of representation, imposes on us, sufficiently for the purposes of Poetry. It induces us to believe, with hypothetic and voluntary faith, the existence of those false events, and imaginary personages, those αδυνατα, αλογα, ψευδη—those marvellous and incredible fictions, which, otherwife managed, we should have rejected: that is, their improbability, or impossibility, would have fo forced themselves upon our notice, as to destroy, or disturb, even the flight and willing illusion of the moment.

Whenever, fays the philosopher, fuppoling such a thing to be, it would certainly be followed by fuch effects; if we see those effects, we are disposed to infer the existence of that cause. And thus, in Poetry, and all fiction, this is the logic of that temporary imposition on which depends our pleasure. The reader of a play, or a novel, does not, indeed, fyllogize, and fay to himfelf-" Such "beings as are here supposed, had they existed, must have acted "and fpoken exactly in this manner; therefore, I believe they " bave existed:"-but he feels the truth of the premises, and he confents to feel the truth of the conclusion; he does not revolt from the imagination of fuch beings. Every thing follows fo naturally, and, even, as it feems, fo necessarily, that the probability and truth of nature, in the confequences, steals, in a manner, from our view, even the impossibility of the cause, and flings an air of truth over the whole. With respect to fact, indeed, all is equally DEUS 36:

ψευδ©₂; for if the causes exist not, neither can the efficets. But the consequent lies are so told, as to impose on us, for the moment, the belief of the antecedent, or fundamental lie⁴.

For infrances of this art, no reader can be at a loss. He will find them, not only in almost all the "fpeciofa miracula" of Homer, but even in the wilder and more absurd miracles of Ariosto; whose poem is, indeed, a striking example of the most improbable, and, in themselves, revolting liese, to which, however, every poetical reader willingly throws open his imagination; principally, I believe, from the easy charm of his language and versification, and the remarkable distinctness of his painting; but, partly too, from the truth and nature which he has contrived to sling into the detail of his description. But were I to chuse, from the productions of poetic genius at large, an example, which would, singly, illustrate this passage of Aristotle, more than any other that I recollect, it should be the Caliban of Shakspeare.

I shall only add, without troubling the reader with any comment of mine, one passage of the Rhetoric, which may serve, both to illustrate the paralogism itself, here alluded to, and to confirm the application which I have given it. In that passage, Aristotle applies the paralogism παρ έπομενον, to the effect of oratorical elocution, in producing persuasion and conviction in the hearers.

Πιθανοι δε το πραγμα, και ἡ δικεια λεξις ΠΑΡΑΛΟΓΙΖΕΤΑΙ γαρ ἡ ψυχη, ως ἀληθως λεγοντω, ότι, ἐπι τοις τοιετοις, ἐτως ἐχεσιν ως ε διονται, ει και μη έτως ἐχει, ως ὁ λεγων, τα πραγματα, έτως ἐχειν .— "What "the Orator says, is, likewise, rendered probable and credible by

Murder'd impossibility, to make
What cannot be, flight work.——

All v. Sc. 3.

d Hobbes, with his usual acuteness, observes, that "probable fiction is similar to read soning rightly from a false principle." p. 13, of his works, Sect. 9.

^e It may be faid of this Poet, in the language of Shakspeare's Coriolanus, that he has——

¹ Rhet. III. 7, p. 590.—See also, ibid. eap. xvi. p. 603, Ε. ετι, εκ των παθητικων, &c.. a passage, which Victorius cites as illustrating the words—δια γας το είδεναι, &c.

[&]quot; a suitable

"a fuitable diction and clocution. For we are cheated into the perfuation, that the orator fpeaks truly, merely because we know that men, so circumstanced as he assumes to be, are actually affected in that manner: so that we take it for granted, that things are really as the speaker represents them to be, when, in fact, they are not so."

The art here pointed out by Aristotle, as eminent in Homer's poetry, evidently extends to siction in general; but, by ψευδη, I understand him to allude, chiefly, to sictions of the extraordinary, marvellous, and improbable kind—fuch as require the utmost art and management of the Poet to make them pass. The connection of the whole passage, if I am not mistaken, shews this to be the author's meaning; the application of ψευδη being fixed, both by the terms θαυμαςου, and ἀλογου, in what precedes, and by the ἀδυνατα και ἐκκοτα which follow, and which I take to be, or, at least, to include, those very ψευδη λεγομενα ώς δει, of which he had, immediately before, been speaking.

N O T E 223.

P. 120. If, However, Any thing of this kind, &c.

I much doubt of the integrity of the text. The fense I have given seems to be the only one, which the passage, as it now stands, will reasonably bear. Dacier, after Victorius, understands—" if the admission of one improbable circumstance be the means of giving more probability to the rest." I do not well comprehend this: I am sure it is not what Aristotle has said. His words are, αν δε θη, και φαινηται ευλογωτερον—i. e. " if he bas introduced fuch a circumstance, or incident, and it (not the rest, the section) has some appearance of probability," &c.

I suppose Aristotle meant to say, that, though improbabilities, are certainly faults, and ought to be carefully avoided in the first choice and structure of a fable, yet, they might be so well managed by a Poet of genius, (especially in the Epic, which is here the subject,) as to appear rather probable—ευλογωτερον;—to pass with some shew of probability; and, in this case, should be admitted, or tolerated, even though pushed to the aronov, or absurd. This fense accords perfectly with what immediately follows, which is precifely an inftance of fuch management; of abfurdity, or, at least, improbability, (τα έν Οδυσσεια άλογα—) veiled by the charms of poetry, and finding almost as ready an admission into the imagination of the reader, under the passport of the beauties by which it is accompanied, as if it were, in itself, ever fo confonant to nature and experience. With respect to the words - ενδεχεσθαι και άτοπον—it feems necessary to adopt one or the other of the two manuscript readings—εκδεχεσθαι, οτ αποδεχεσθαι. The former of these verbs Mr. Winstanley takes in the sense of απειργείν, κωλυείν, upon the authority of Suidas. But in the very paffage adduced by that lexicographer, the immediate fense of endeχεσθαι is, to receive. Γερρα τε παρατεταγμένα ήν, εις το ΕΚΔΕΧΕΣΘΑΙ τα των βαρβαρων τοξευματα. i. e. to receive them; and by receiving them to keep them off from their bodies. Arcere, here, is only what we may call the confequential meaning of the word. I do not see, that it may not, in this place, very well bear the sense of receiving, admitting, or, rather, tolerating: but of this I would not be understood to speak positively. This seems, at least, to be the fense, which the purport of the passage requires; and it refers, I think, not to the Poet himfelf, as some understand it, but to the audience, or the reader. When Aristotle has just said, ar de byi. c. "but if he bas introduced, or admitted it," how can he be understood to add, " he should admit it?" Farther, the word ανεπτα, (tolerabilia,) which, in the instance immediately subjoined, clearly relates to the hearer, or reader, feems fufficiently to fix fix the fame reference of the correspondent word, ἐκδεχεσθαι, or ἀποδεχεσθαι, here.

Mr. Harris, in his Philol. Inquiries, p. 220, though he has not quoted, or translated, this particular passage, appears, pretty clearly, to allude to it, and to have understood the verb as here explained. He says, speaking of improbabilities in the drama—" 'Tis true, '' indeed, did such plays exist,'' [$\partial v \partial v \partial u \partial u$] " and were their other " dramatic requisites good, these improbabilities might be endured, " and the plays be still admired."

The version of Piccolomini agrees with mine:—" Ma se, po-"nendovisi poi qualche cosa, che in se habbia del non ragionevole, "si adornerà, & si tratterà, in maniera, ch'ella apparir possa ragio-"nevole, potrà, in tal caso, trovarvi luogo." p. 392.

N O T E 224.

P. 121. THE ABSURDITY IS CONCEALED UNDER THE VA-

In the language of Pindar,—

Και πε τι και βροτων φρενας, ύπες τον άληθη λογον, δεδαιδαλμενοι ψευδεσι ποικιλοις* εξαπατωντι μυθοι.

ΧΑΡΙΣ δ', άπες άπαντα τευ-χει τα μειλιχα θνατοις, έπιφεςοισα τιμαν,
ΚΑΙ ΑΠΙΣΤΟΝ ΈΜΗΣΑΤΟ ΠΙΣΤΟΝ
ΕΜΜΕΝΑΙ———. Olymp. I.

• "L'homme est de glace aux verités,
"Il est de seu pour les mensonges."

La Fontaine, Fab. 174.

3 R 2

The reader, I believe, will be pleased with the comparison of a poetical passage so remarkably apposite to this observation of the philosopher; and, indeed, to all this part of his treatise, relative to the management of siction.

On account of the same general relation to the subject, I may be excused for adding these agreeable lines of Plautus:

Sed quasi Poeta, tabulas cum cepit sibi, Quærit quod nusquam est gentium, reperit tamen, Facit illud verismile quod mendacium est,—• Nunc ego Poeta siam.

Pseud. Act I. Sc. 4.

N O T E 225.

P. 121. THE IDLE PARTS OF THE POEM-.

'APΓA μερη. The expression is best explained, according to my idea of it, by Castelvetro.—" Dobbiamo—intendere per parti" otiose, quelle, nelle quali il poeta parla di sua persona, & con sur favella sua ci sa vedere quello che si sa: le quali percio si do- mandano, μερη αργα, che non sono in atto, ed operanti, come sono quelle, le quali sono rappresentate in palco, & quelle, nelle quali per gli poeti epopei sono introdotte le persone à favellare; le quali parti, perche paiono pressoche montare in palco, ed operare, si contrapon sono alle parti otiose, e contengono, principalmente, le sententie, ed, accessoriamente, i costumi." p. 578.

Dacier's "parties foibles," in which he is followed by M. Batteux, presents a different, and, I think, a wrong idea.

N O T E 226.

P. 121. IN WHICH NEITHER MANNERS NOR SENTIMENTS PREVAIL.

It has been inquired, why Aristotle here passes over in silence the passionate parts of the Poem; to which a laboured and splendid diction seems as ill suited, as it is to the expression of manners and sentiments. This inquiry has produced another; whether he did, or did not, mean to include the passionate parts in διανοητικοις. Madius contends that he did: Victorius, that he did not. I believe the latter is right. For if we take διανοια, here, in that wide sense which is given it in cap. xix². it will include "whatever is the object of speech;"—" every thing," as Mr. Harris has explained it, " for which men employ language b." If, therefore, the μερη διανοητικα, here, comprehend those thoughts which express passion, they will also comprehend such as express manners, or character; from which Aristotle expressly distinguishes them: μητε ήθωιοις, μητε διανοητικοις.

But, whether he did, or did not, mean to include the passionate parts of the Poem, it seems true, and he would probably have allowed it, that such a diction as he here describes is improper for the expression of passion: nor is this at all inconsistent, as, on a superficial view, it may seem to be, with the following passage in his Rhetoric.—Τα δε δνοματα, τα επίθετα, μαι διπλα πλειω, και τα ξενα, μαλιξα άρμοττει λεγοντ: ΠΑΘΗΤΙΚΩΣ΄ συγγνωμη γαρ ζογιζομενώ, κακον φανάι " ερανομηκες, ή πελωριον" ειπειν°, &cc. The strong and figurative language, and, what may be called, the natural Poetry of b Philolog. Inquiries, p. 173, &c.

^{*} Transl. p. 103.

^{*} Rhet. III. 7, p. 590, E.

passion—a fort of Poetry which we every day hear from the mouths of those, who never made, and scarce, perhaps, ever read, a verse—this is a very different thing from the AIAHONEIN lega, the AIAN AAMHPA legas, of which the philosopher here speaks.—But, for an exact, though short, discussion of this subject, with its proper distinctions and limitations, I must refer the reader to an excellent note on v. 94, of Horace's Epistle to the Pissa. It will be found, I think, perfectly consistent with both the passages of Aristotle here considered, and will afford the best support to the above remarks.—See NOTE 209.

N O T E 227.

P. 121. OBSCURED BY TOO SPLENDID A DICTION.

ΑΠΟΚΡΥΠΤΕΙ γας παλιν ή λιαν λαμπςα λεξις τα ήθη και τας διανοιας.

—In the fame fenfe, in which εγκςυπτεται is used, in a similar passage of Longinus, Sect. 15.—where, speaking of the effect of lively imagery, in stealing one's attention from argument, he says, Φυσει δε πως, εν τοις τοιετοις άπασιν, απα τε κρειττον ακεομεν όθεν, απο τε αποδεικτικε περιελκομεθα εις το κατα φαντασιαν εκπλημτικον, ώ το πραγματικον ΕΓΚΡΥΠΤΕΤΑΙ ΠΕΡΙΛΑΜΠΟΜΕΝΟΝ.—So also, Sect. 17.—ΑΠΕΚΡΥΨΕ το σχημα—τω ΦΩΤΙ ΑΥΤΩι.—And again—δια ΛΑΜΗΡΟΤΗΤΑ—την τεχνην ΑΠΟΣΚΙΑΖΕΙ, και διον εν ΚΑΤΑ-ΚΑΛΥΨΕΙ τηρει.

The following passage of the Rhetoric, concerning the mixture of the argumentative with the pathetic, will also help to illustrate that before us.—Και όταν παθώ ποιης, μη λεγε ένθυμημα ή γαρ έκκρεσει το παθώ, ή ματην ειρημενον έςαι, το ένθυμημα έκκης εστι γαρ άι κινησεις άλληλας, άι άμα και, ή ΑΦΑΝΙΖΟΥΣΙΝ, ή άσθενεις ποιεσιν, Rhet. III.
17. p. 604, E.

In the fame manner the expression of Aristotle is well explained by Piccolomini, in his commentary, p. 394.

d Dr. Hurd's Horace, vol. i. See, particularly, p. 79, 80.

N O T E 228.

P. 123. In words, either common, or foreign, &c.

Λεξει ἢ και γλωτταις—. Heinf. KΥΡΙΑι λεξει, ἢ και γλωτταις. The infertion feems necessary, but would, perhaps, be better thus: λεξει, Η ΚΥΡΙΑι, ἢ και γλωτταις, &c. Victorius and other commentators suppose κυρια to be understood. But this I cannot conceive. Λεξις appears clearly to be used here, as in cap. xxii. for diction in general, including, as in that chapter, every fort of words.

NOTE 229.

P. 123. Which are the privilege of Poets.

ΔΙΔΟΜΕΝ γαρ ταυτα τοις ποιηταις. The same expression is made use of by Isocrates, in the following passage, to which I referred in NOTE 5, p. 158, and in which the privileges and advantages of the Poet are well set forth, and the importance of verse to the effect of even the best poetry, is strongly insisted on.

Τοις μεν γας ποιηταις πολλοι ΔΕΔΟΝΤΑΙ κοσμοι. Και γας πλησιαζούτας τοις ανθρωποις τες θεες διουτ' αυτοις έςι ποιησαι, και διαλεγομενες, και συναγωνίζομενες, δις αν βεληθωσι' και περι τετων δηλωσαι, μη μονον τοις τεταγμενοις " ονομασιν, αλλα, τα μεν, ξενοις, τα δε, καινοις, τα δε, μεταφοραις και μηδεν παραλιπεν, άλλα πασι τοις είδεσι διαποικίλαι την ποιησιν: Τοις δε περι τες λογες έδεν έξεςι των τοιετων άλλ' αποτομως, και των όνοματων τοις πολιτικοις , και των ενθυμηματων τοις περι αυτας τας πραξεις, ^{*} τεταγμενοις, here, is equivalent to Aristotle's πυριοις; as, παινεις, to his πεποιημενοις, and ξενοις, to his γλωτταις.

[•] See note 57, p. 255.

αναγκαιον εξι χρησθαι. Προς δε τετοις, δι μεν μετα μετρων και ξυθμων άπωντα ποιεσι' δι δε εδεν επτων κοινωνεσιν' ά τοσαυτην έχει χαριν, ως, αν και τη λεξει, και τοις ενθυμηματιν, έχη κακως, όμως ταις γε ευρυθμιαις και ταις συμμετριαις εψυχαγωγετι τες άκεοντας. Καταμαθοι δ' άν τις έκειθεν την δυναμιν άυτων' εν γαρ τις των ποιηματων των ευδοκιμεντών τα μεν δυρματα και τας διαισιας καταλιπη, το δε ΜΕΤΡΟΝ διαλυση, φανησεται πολυ καταδεεςερα της δοξης, ες νυν έχομεν περι άυτων'. See NOTE 5, p. 158, the passage from Plato.

N O T E 230.

P. 123. WHAT IS RIGHT IN THE POETIC ART, IS A DISTINCT CONSIDERATION FROM WHAT IS RIGHT IN THE POLITICAL, OR ANY OTHER ART.

This is one of those passages, which the commentators appear to me to have darkened by illustration. See, particularly, Dacier's note. His account of the difference between Poetry and all other arts, seems evidently salse. What Aristotle says of Poetry—that it has two kinds of saults, essential, and incidental—is, at least, true of all other imitative arts. It is even true, as Beni has shewn, of Rhetoric and Logic^a. Aristotle only says, (to give the passage literally,) "the rightness of the poetic, and the rightness of the poetic art." The plain meaning of which appears to me to be that which I have given—that the deforms, or rectitude, of Poetry itself, is not to be consounded with that of Politics, nor of any [·] Euag. circ. init.

a "Nam Rhetorica & Dialectica suos egredi fines solent, & in alienos campos "excurrere, perinde serè ac nos de Poetica docemus. Temerè igitur Aristoteles, quod inter Poeticam & Politicam notavit discrimen, idem inter Poeticam, rursus, "ac cæteras artes, notasset: nam Rhetorica & Dialectica ejustem videri possunt recuititudinis cum Poetica." Benii Comm. in Arist. Poet. p. 460.

other art that may be the incidental fubject of the Poetry, which, in itself, may be good, and even excellent, though it may deliver things false or inaccurate in Politics, Natural History, Navigation, Geography, &c. This sense of the passage seems clear of all the difficulties with which the common explanation is embarrassed, and leads naturally to the following division of the faults of Poetry, into essential and incidental.—Castelvetro is the only one, of the commentators I have consulted, who appears to agree with me, if I understand him rightly, in this explanation of the passage b.

The allusion, here, to the severe objections of Plato, who would allow of Poetry no farther than as it could be made to coincide with the views of his own strict and moral legislation, has been fufficiently pointed out. The reader may fee, particularly, a fine passage to this purpose in the seventh book of his Laws, [p. 817, ed. Serr.] where, addressing the Tragic Poets, he refuses to admit them into his republic, till the magistrates have fatisfied themselves, by inspection of their poems, that they contain nothing but what is in perfect unifon with the laws and moral discipline of the state. - Μη δη δοζητε ήμας ραδίως γε έτως ύμας ποτε παρ' ήμιν έασειν, σκηνας τε πηξαντας κατ' άγοραν, και καλλιφωνες ύποκριτας εισαγομενες, μείζον φθεγγομενες ήμων, επιτρεψειν ύμιν δημηγορειν προς παιδας τε και γυναικας και τον παντα όχλον, των αυτων λεγοντας επιτηδευματων περι μη τα άυτα άπερ ήμεις, άλλ', ώς το πολυ, και έναντια τα πλειςα. γαρ τοι κ'αν μαινοιμεθα τελεως ήμεις τε και άπασα ή πολις, ήτις έν ύμιν έπιτρεποι δράν τα νυν λεγομενα, πριν κριναι τας άρχας, ειτε έητα και επιτηδεια πεποιηκατε λεγειν εις το μεσον, ειτε μη. Νυν εν, ω παιδες μαλακων μυσων εκγονοι, επιδαζαντες τοις άρχεσι πρωτον τας ύμετερας παραιτας ήμετερας ώδας, αν μεν τα αυτα γε, ή και βελτιω, τα παρ ύμων φαινηται λεγομενα, δωσομεν ύμιν χορον· εί δε μη, ω φιλοι, εκ αν ποτε δυναιμεθα.—De Leg. VII. p. 817.—To this way of talking it was a plain and direct answer, b See p. 592, and 599, of his commentary.

to fay—Ουχ' ή ἀυτη ὀςθοτης εςι της ΠΟΛΙΤΙΚΗΣ και της ΠΟΙΗ-ΤΙΚΗΣ.

In what is added—εδε άλλης τεχνης και ποιητικης—Aristotle may, I think, be supposed to glance more particularly at that part of the tenth book of Plato's Republic, where he exposes the idle notion, current among the rhapfodifts, that Homer was a perfect master of all arts and sciences. And with respect to the absurdity of this notion, Aristotle undoubtedly agreed with him. But there was danger, left the credit of Homer should suffer from the manner in which Plato combated this idea. For those extravagant admirers of Homer not only afferted the fact, that he had an accurate knowledge of every art and science on which he touched, but they went farther, and maintained, that fuch accuracy was effential to a good Poet: Αναγκη γαρ, they urged, τον άγαθον ποιητην, ει μελλει περι ών αν ποιη, καλως ποιησειν, ειδοτα άρα ποιειν, ή μη όιοντε είναι ποιειν 4 . Now Plato, whose object here is to vindicate his rigid exclusion of all mimetic poetry, and that of Homer in particular, from his republic, confutes the fact, without confuting the general position. While he shews the pretensions of the Homerists to be false, he feems, at least, to allow, that they ought to be true. For he flings in no favings; he no where fays, what Aristotle has here faid for him—that the want of this supposed accurate knowledge of arts and sciences no way affects the character of Homer as a By denying that he bad that knowledge, and, at the same time, not denying, or not expressly denying, that he ought to have it, he leaves the reader to understand, that he meant to detract, on this account, from his merit as an imitator. And this, indeed, is perfectly confonant to the whole design of this part of his work, which was, to discredit poetic imitation in general, by shewing the distance of its representations from truth.

^c This very word, δεβοτης, is often used by Plato; and, particularly, in this passage, which perhaps Aristotle had in his view—Καιτοι λεγησι γε οι πλεισοι, μεσικης ΌΡΘΟ-ΤΗΤΑ έτραι την ήδεσην ταις Φυχαις περιζεσαν δυναμιν.—An idea which he rejects with abhorrence. The word μεσικη here is used in its widest acceptation, including Poetry, De Leg. ii. 655.

⁴ Rep. X. p. 598, E. ad. Serr.

N O T E 231.

P. 123. THE FAULTS OF POETRY, &c.

The original is— ΑΥΤΗΣ δε της ποιητικης διττη ή άμαχτία. The word αυτης appears to me to make strange confusion. For Aristotle is here distinguishing two forts of faults in Poetry, essential and accidental; and his expression, presently after, for the former, is ΑΥΤΗΣ ή άμαρτια—" a fault of the Poetry itself." As the text stands, therefore, it is just as if he had said—" There are two "faults of the Poetry itself: one, of the Poetry itself, and the "other, incidental."—Accordingly Dacier, Batteux, and almost all the translators, neglect the word ἀυτης. Possibly it might, originally, have stood thus:—ἀδε άλλης τεχνης, και ποιητικης ἀυτης. Της ΔΕ ποιητικης, &c.

This fanciful argument is thus shortly and clearly stated in the Comment. on the Ep. to the Pisos, &c. vol. i. p. 254. "Poetical expression," says the philosopher [Plato], is the copy of the Poet's own conceptions; the Poet's conception, of things, and things, of the standing archetype, as existing in the divine mind. Thus the Poet's expression is a copy at third hand, from the primary, original truth."—See Plato De Rep. 10. p. 597, 598.—To prove his point the better, he shews, that the Poet's conceptions are distant even from the truth of things, because his knowledge of those things is impersect and inaccurate. p. 598, 599.

N O T E 232.

P. 123. If the Poet has undertaken to imitate without talents for imitation——.

Ει μεν γας προειλετο μιμησασθαι ἀδυναμιαν.—So, the MSS. But αδυναμια never, I believe, means impossibility, but want of power, incapacity a. This was, long ago, sufficiently proved by Victorius. If the word be right, some preposition must be wanting. Heinsus supplies—KAT αδυναμιαν. The credit of the conjecture is due to Castelvetro b. Still the phrase, μιμησασθαι κατ αδυναμιαν, for imitating without ability, or talents, for imitation, is harsh, and, as far as I know, unsupported by any other example. It seems not improbable, that Aristotle might have written it—ΠΑΡΑ ΔΥΝΑ-ΜΙΝ. Supposing the three first letters of the preposition to have been destroyed, the passage would stand thus—μιμησασθαι  ΑΔΥ-ΝΑΜΙΝ: which it was obvious enough for the transcriber to mission to a source into αδυναμιαν. The phrase, προείλετο μιμησασθαι παρα δυναμιν, would be clear and unexceptionable. So, cap. ix.—παρα την δυναμιν παρατείναντες μυθον.

Victorius remarks, and, I think, justly, that Horace probably had his eye upon this passage, in the lines—

Sumite materiam vestris, qui scribitis, æquam Viribus; et versate diu, quid serre recusent, Quid valeant, humeri. Cui lecta potenter erit res, &c.

Epist. ad Pist. v. 38, &c.

—where Aristotle's προαιρεισθαι, he thinks, is expressed by "fumite "materiam," and, letta res:" and κατ' αδυναμιαν glanced at in the other expressions, but, particularly, in the adverb—" potenter."

ı¹.

² Αδυναμια δε έςι ΣΤΕΡΗΣΙΣ ΔΥΝΑΜΕΩΣ. Metaph. V. 12. p. 893, C.

P. 602, of his commentary.

N O T E 233.

P. 123. TO HAVE REPRESENTED THINGS IMPOSSIBLE WITH RESPECT TO SOME OTHER ART, &c.

No interpretation that I have feen, or been able to devise, of this whole ambiguous, perplexed, and, probably, mangled passage, is without its difficulties. All I could do was, to chuse that, which, after the closest attention to the original, and to the best comments, appeared to me "minimis urgeri." I will not attempt to drag the reader after me, through the detail of my own doubts and embarrassiments. But lest my version, from that degree of closeness, to which, in all passages where the meaning is doubtful, I have thought it right to confine myself, should retain, in some degree, the ambiguity, or obscurity, of the original, some explanation may be necessary.

By the various expressions, μιμησασθαι κατ' ἀδυναμιαν—ἀμαρτια ή καθ' ἀυτην—ἀυτης—καθ' ἐαυτην, and, above all, by KAKOMIMHTΩΣ ἐγραψε, which seems to fix clearly the sense of the rest, Aristotle means, I think, to indicate all such faults as are incompatible with good imitation—that is, in his view, with good Poetry. All other faults he denominates, κατα συμβεβηκω—incidental. Faults he allows them to be; but smaller, and more pardonable, saults: ΕΛΑΤΤΟΝ γαρ, ἐι μη ἡδει, &c. In this class he reckons, τα ἀδυνατα—things impossible. The expression is unhappily ambiguous: for we may understand either ἀδυνατα in general, or, ἀδυνατα κατ' ἰατρικην ἡ ἀλλην τεχνην. The commentators are divided. I cannot be of their party, who adopt the first of these sense. I see not how impossibilities, or absurdities*, in general, could, consist-

* That the ἀδυνατα here meant are not what he afterwards calls πθανα ἀδυνατα, probable impossibilities, but such as he denominates ἀλογα, is plain from his instance; παραδειγμα, η τε Έμτορος διωξες, which he had, in the preceding chapter, expressly given as an instance of the ἀλογον. See Transl. p. 118, 119.

ently with Arinotle's principles, be admitted by him into the number of merely incidental faults — κατα συμβεβηκω—fuch as affected not the Poetry itself. We must, I think, understand—δμαφτηματα η αδυνατα—things inaccurate, or, what is worse, impossible, καθ έκας ην τεχνην—upon the principles of some other art b.

Aristotle then goes on, and applies his folution, founded on the foregoing diffinction, to the worft species of such incidental faults— Take, he fays, the worst: suppose the Poet to to things αδυνατα. have represented something impossible, with respect to some particular art, as that of medicine, geography, &c. This, strictly speaking, is a fault; but it is a fault that may even be justified, (ορθως έχοι,) if, by means of it, the Poet has answered, better than he could have done without it, the end of his own art, &c.—Still, he continues, fupposing this not to be the case, we are to consider, whether the fault, admitting it to be a fault, be των κατα την τεχνην, η κατ' άλλο συμβεβημω, &c.—If the pursuit of Hector cannot be absolutely justified by the θαυμαςου, the ἐκπληξις which is produced by it, still it is not κακομιμητως γεγραμμενον; the Poetry is good, and the end of Poetry, the pleasure arising from the wonderful and the striking, is actually attained, though it be true, that it might have been attained without the fault in question.

By the expression, τα προς αυτην την τεχνην αδυνατα, I understand—with respect to the art of which the Poet speaks; not, with respect to the art of Poetry itself: though I confess the latter sense to be that, which the words, αυτην την τεχνην, the art itself, most natuturally present. But this sense of the expression seems to me to be utterly irreconcilable with the sense of the whole passage. In rejecting it I have the concurrence of Victorius, Piccolomini, and M. Batteux.—Besides, that the expression itself seems to be jargon.

² In recapitulating the different critical objections to which Poets were exposed, he expressly selects improbability, and vitious manners, as the justisft grounds of centure. Ορθη δε ἐπιτιμποις, και ΛΛΟΓΙΑ και μοχθηρία. Cap. penult.

b So M. Batteux: see his note on the passage.

For, what are "things impossible to, (or, with respect to,) the art of "Poetry itself?"—The only reasonable meaning of the phrase is—things, which it is beyond the power of the art to represent or imitate; as it is beyond the power of painting to imitate sounds'. But how can the phrase be applied, as Dacier applies it, to the along, "deraisonnable—tout ce qui est absurde?" Is it not just as possible for Poetry to represent a horse flying, as a ship sailing?—The sense, which I have given, seems also supported by the antithetic expression that follows— $\tau \in \lambda \otimes \tau_0$ ATTHS—"its own pur-"pose;" and still more by the clearer phrase which he presently after uses— $\tau \eta \nu$ HEPI TOTTON $\tau \in \chi \nu \eta \nu$ —" the art to which these "things belong."

I must, however, repeat my confession, that no passage of this treatise appears to me to be of more desperate perplexity than this; nor is there any of the numerous and stubborn difficulties I have had to encounter, of which I wish to be understood to offer my solution with less considence. Here, as in many other places, had I waited for perfect satisfaction, I might have stood still for ever:—

Εικελ άνδοι
Κεινώ, ός εν τριοδοισι πολυτριπτοισι κυρησας
Έςη εφορμαινων κραδιη δε δι άλλοτε λαιην,
Αλλοτε δεξιτερην επιβαλλεται εις όδον ελθειν.
Παπταινει δ' έκατερθε νο δε δι η υτε κυμα
Έιλειται,—μαλα δ' όψε μιης ώρεξατο βελης 1.

[•] Plato uses— ἀδυνατα ΕΝ τη τεχνη, in this sense: —Κυβερνητης ἀκρΦ, ἡ ἐατρΦ, τα τε ΑΔΥΝΑΤΑ ΕΝ ΤΗ ΤΕΧΝΗ, και τα δυνατα, διαισθαιεται, Rep. II. p. 360. ed. Serr.

d Oppian, Άλιευτ. III. 501, &c.

N O T E 234.

P. 123. According to what has been already said of that end.

Το γας τελ. EIPHTAI. This reading has been questioned; but, I think, without sufficient reason. It may very well be understood to refer to all that Aristotle had said, or, at least, binted, about the end of the art—the θαυμαςου, cb. xxiv.—ευπληξις, cap. xiv. and xvi. &c. This is not the only instance in this treatise, of reference to something implied, as if it had been expressly faid.—See NOTE 150, p. 396, and note (g.)

Victorius illustrates ἐκπληκτικωτερον by an apt quotation from Aristotle himself: Δοκει δε ή ΕΚΠΛΗΞΙΣ ΘΑΥΜΑΣΙΟΤΗΣ ἐιναι ΥΠΕΡΒΑΛΛΟΥΣΑ. Τορ. lib. iv.

Strabo fays-Muθε ΤΕΛΟΣ, ήδουην και ΕΚΠΛΗΞΙΝ. p. 25. ed. Caf.

N O T E 235.

P. 124. WHETHER A FAULT BE, &c.

Ποτεςων έςι το άμαςτημα των κατα την τεχνην, η κατ άλλο συμβε-βηκω.—I cannot perceive, that this wants any emendation; much less, that it is, as Mr. Winstanley says, "nullo sensu." He contends for the certainty of ΑΤΟΠΩΤΕΡΟΝ—a reading, which Robortelli says he found in all the manuscripts he consulted. I would only ask, whether Aristotle can be conceived to have written such a sentence as this?—" A fault in the Poetry itself is a more absurd thing than a fault in some other incidental matter; for it is a less fault," &c. Yet this, I think, is the plain English of the Greek—

Greek—Ετι, άτοπωτερον έςι το άμαρτημα των κατα την τεχνην, ή κατ' άλλο συμβεβηκιώ έλαττον ΓΑΡ—κ. τ. λ.

Victorius contends strongly, and, I think, with much better reason. for ποτερων. He says well—" Nam quæ adjunguntur videntur sig-" nificare ita prorsus legi debere: duo enim genera peccatorum " contraria inter se indicant. Utrorum igitur peccatorum id, cujus " arguitur poeta, videndum esse præcipit: alterum enim eorum genus faciliorem excusationem habet." p. 274.

N O T E 236.

P. 124. HAS NOT REPRESENTED THINGS CONFORMABLY TO TRUTH—.

'Ουκ ἀληθη.—An ἐπιτιμησις very frequent in the mouth of Plato, to whom, undoubtedly, Aristotle here alludes. "The Poets ought "not," says Plato, speaking of the representations of Hesiod and Homer, "to be permitted to tell us—ως θεοι θεοις πολεμεσι τε, και ἐπιβελευεσι και μαχονται ΟΥΔΕ γαρ ΑΛΗΘΗ"."—They ought not, λοιδοςειν ἀπλως έτω τα ἐν ἀδε, ἀλλα, μαλλον, ἐπαινειν ως ΟΥΤ' ΑΛΗΘΗ λεγοντας, ἐτ' ἀφελιμα τοις μελλεσι μαχιμοις ἐσεσθαι .—So again, of Homer's account of the cruel treatment of the body of Hector by Achilles, and of his facrificing twelve Trojan captives to the manes of Patroclus [Il. ψ.]: ξυμπαντα ταυτα ΟΥ φησομεν ΑΛΗΘΗ ἐιρησθαι.—And again, presently after—ουθ' ὁσια ταυτα, ΟΥΤ' ΑΛΗΘΗ'. Το all which objections, as appears from what follows, Aristotle's answer would have been—ότι έτω ΦΑΣΙΝ.

a De Rep. II. p. 142. ed. Mass.

^b Ibid. III. p. 160.—He alludes particularly to the famous declaration of Achilles, Od. A. 487, which he immediately quotes; with other passages of the same kind.

[·] Ibid. p. 174.

N O T E 237.

P. 124. Sophocles—Drew Men, such As they should BE; Euripides, such As they ARE.

The difference here intended, between the two great Tragic Poets, feems to me to be rightly explained by Dacier in few words: "Sophocle tâchoit de rendre ses imitations parfaites, en " fuivant toujours bien plus ce qu' une belle nature etoit capable " de faire, que ce qu'elle faisoit. Au lieu qu' Buripide ne tra-" vailoit qu' à les rendre femblables, en consultant davantage ce " que cette même nature faisoit, que ce qu'elle etoit capable de "faire." p. 458.—It is thus indeed, that, by comparing different passages, we shall find Aristotle clearly explain himself. What he here means by ἀληθη, is sufficiently clear from the synonymous expressions, διοι εισι - δια ην, η εςιν, in this chapter, and όμοιες—καθ ήμας—and, δι νυν, in chapter ii. where he explains the different objects of poetic imitation a. To these expressions are opposed another set of expressions, which I take to be synonymous with each other—οια είναι δει—είνες δει, here; το βελτίον, and the παραδαγμα ύπερεχου, prefently after; καλλικς, cap. xv b. — βελτιονας η καθ' ημας—βελτιονας των νυν, cap. ii . All these expressions correspond to the various expressions of, improved nature—la belle nature—ideal beauty, &c. in modern writers.

The objection then, to which Aristotle here points out the best answer, I understand to be this—" Your imitation is not true; it " is not an exact copy of such nature as we see about us."—The answer is—" No: but it is an improved copy. If I have not " represented things as they are, I have represented them as they " ought to be."

^{*} Transl. Part I. Sect. 3. * Transl. p. 94. * Part I. Sect. 3. A very

A very different explanation of this passage has been given by an eminent critic; but, I consess, it appears to me to be irreconcilable with Aristotle's expressions, clearly interpreted, as I think they are, by comparison with each other. According to that explanation, the answer of Sophocles to the objection— $2\pi \lambda \eta \eta$, and indeed the sense of the objection itself, are very different from what Dacier, and, I believe, all the commentators, have represented them to be.—The explanation is this:

" And this will further explain an effential difference, as we are "told, between the two great rivals of the Greek stage. "cles, in return to fuch as objected a want of truth in his cha-" racters, used to plead, that he drew men such as they ought to be, "Euripides fuch as they were. Dopondas son, aut the men oirs bei moien, " Eugentidies de, olor elor. The meaning of which is, Sophocles, from "his more extended commerce with mankind, had enlarged and " widened the narrow, partial conception, arifing from the contem-" plation of particular characters, into a complete comprehension " of the kind. Whereas the philosophic Euripides, having been "mostly conversant in the academy, when he came to look into "life, keeping his eye too intent on fingle, really existing person-"ages, funk the kind in the individual; and so painted his cha-" racters naturally indeed, and truly, with regard to the objects " in view, but fometimes without that general and univerfally "ftriking likeness, which is demanded to the full exhibition of " poetical truth "."—Again—after an illustration of this meaning, by a comparative examination of the Electra of Sophocles with that of Euripides, the conclusion is—" Whether this represent-" ation of Sophocles be not more agreeable to truth, as collected " from wide observation, i. e. from human nature at large, than that " of Euripides, the capable reader will judge. If it be, the reason "I suppose to have been, that Sophocles painted his characters, such " as, from attending to numerous instances of the same kind, he would d Comment, on the Ep. to the Pisos, p. 255.

" conclude they ought to be; Euripides, such, as a narrower sphere of observation had persuaded him they were"."

From these two passages compared, it appears, I think, that by some down to be in order to possess "that ge"neral and universally striking likeness, which is demanded to the full "exhibition of poetical truth." But a comparison of Aristotle with himself, in the several passages above referred to, seems to fix the sense clearly to that ideal persection, that poetic elevation and improvement of nature, which may be said, rather, to exclude such "general and universally striking likeness" of "human nature at "large:" and this, I think, was the very objection made to Sophocles by the patrons of his rival.

According to the interpretation which I am taking the liberty to examine, Sophocles is made to answer the charge by denying its truth: for the answer, as here stated, will be this—You say, my representations are not true, and those of Euripides are true. I deny this. You use the term improperly. My representations are "agreeable to truth," because they are "collected from wide obser-"vation, i. e. from human nature at large;" those of Euripides are not agreeable to truth, because they are representations, not of the kind, but of individuals.—The answer, as I understand Aristotle, is very different. The charge is not denied, or explained away, but admitted and justified. Sophocles says, "If you would have "men represented as they are—our interded, go to "Euripides. I have not drawn them so—I never intended to "draw them so. I have done better—I have delineated mankind, "not such as they really are, but such as they ought to be." Eu-

[.] Ibid. p. 259.

The reader will observe, that in all the objections, drawn from this source, the truth of the objections—the facts—" this is not true"—" this is neither true, nor "as it ought to be," &c. are all admitted. Our diamon AAA' dia dei.—Ei de MHD-ETEP $\Omega\Sigma$, die diamon— Δ or Δ ripides does not appear to have been charged, by those objectors, with what may be termed individual improbability of imitation, but with too close and portrait-like delineation of general nature. In fhort, the difference, which I understand to be here intended, between the two Poets, cannot be more exactly expressed, than it is by the ingenious commentator himself, in the beginning of the note to which I refer; where it is observed, [p. 253] that "truth " may be followed too closely in works of imitation, as is evident in two respects. For, 1. the artist, when he would give a "copy of nature, may confine himself too scrupulously to the " exhibition of particulars, and fo fail of representing the general "idea of the kind. Or, 2. in applying himself to give the general "idea, he may collect it from an enlarged view of real life, " whereas it were still better taken from the nobler conception of "it as fubfifting only in the mind." Now, if we apply the latter of these differences to the two Poets in question-if we say, "In " applying himself to give the general idea, Euripides collected it " from an enlarged view of real life; whereas Sophocles took it from "the nobler conception of it, as subsisting only in the mind" this will express exactly what I take to be the sense of Aristotle.

To the support, which the common interpretation of this passage receives from Aristotle himself, may be added that which it receives, and, I believe, is generally acknowledged to receive, from the Tragedies themselves, which are extant, of the two Poets in question. That Euripides is, in general, liable to the censure of particular imitation—of "sinking the kind in the individual," I cannot say I have observed. But who can read this Poet without observing the examples, with which he every where abounds, of that very "general and universally striking likeness, which is demanded "to the full exhibition of poetical truth?" In Sophocles, we find more elevation, more dignity, more of that improved likeness, and ideal perfection, which the philosopher expresses by his δια δει—προς το βελπιον, &c. In Euripides, we find more of the ἀληθές, the δμοιον, &c.—

we are oftener reminded of the common nature and common life, And if this, in conjunction with which we all fee around us. other causes, be sometimes found to lower the imitations of this Poet, beneath the proper level of Tragic dignity, and to produce fomething of the κωμφδια τις ήθολογεμένη, which Longinus attributes to the Odyssey, the fault is amply redeemed, perhaps in those very parts, by the pleasure which results from the closeness and obviousness of the imitation; certainly, in many others, by those precious touches of nature, which must, at once, strike every individual of every audience; such, if I mistake not, as are much more rarely to be found in Sophocles, and fuch, perhaps, as, after all that we have heard about the beau ideal and improved nature, can only be produced by an exact transcript of nature, as it is; of what the Poet has actually felt himself, and actually seen in others.

The truth feems to be, that both in Poetry, and in Painting, if the fublime be aimed at, the Poet, and the Artist, must look up to the δια ΔΕΙ ἐιναι: their eyes may "glance from earth to heaven," and they may "body forth the form of things unknown." But, if emotion and the pathetic be their object, they will, neither of them, attain their end, unless they submit to descend a little towards earth, and to copy with some closeness that nature which is before their eyes. We are told of Michael Angelo, that "his "people are a superior order of beings;" that "there is nothing about them, nothing in the air of their actions, or their attitudes, "or the style and cast of their very limbs or features, that puts one in mind of their belonging to our own species." If this be the character of that painter's works, I must consess, for my own part, that I should be disposed to turn from them to those of the charming artist, whose words I quote, where we see human nature h Such as were mentioned in NOTE 33.

i Seet. 9.

k Sir Jos. Reynolds's Discourses, &c. p. 170.

improved, but not forgotten. I am very well content to be reminded of my own species, as he reminds me of them. But this, at least, is certain, that such a character, applied to a Tragic Poet, would be the severest censure that criticism could pronounce*.

N O T E 238.

P. 124. But, as Xenophanes says, &c.

Αλλ' ἐτυχεν, ὡτπες Ξενοφωνης ἀλλ' ἐ ΦΑΣΙ τωδε. Thus all the MSS. and editions. Victorius proposed—ἀλλ' ἐ ΣΑΦΗ τωδε: and supported his conjecture by the following fragment of Xenophanes, preserved in Sext. Empiricus, to which he supposes Aristotle to allude:

Και το μεν έν ΣΑΦΕΣ έτις άνης ίδεν, έδε τις έςαι Ειδως, άμφι θεων τε, και όσσα λεγω περι παντων. Ει γαρ και τα μαλιςα ΤΥΧΟΙ τετελεσμενον είπων, Αυτ© όμως έν διδε, δοκ® δ' έπι πασι τετυκται².

Few conjectural emendations invite affent by a more remarkable union of ingenuity and probability: and, as it appears to me, that, without some emendation, nothing confistent or fatisfactory can be made of the passage, we need, I think, have little scruple in admitting the reading of Victorius as true, till manuscript authority produces something better.

Xenophanes is here introduced, probably, because he had written against the theology of Homer and Hestod. The sollowing lines are quoted from him by Sextus Empiricus:

- * The writer just quoted, among other excellent observations on this subject, in his notes on Du Fresnoy, allows, that, even in painting, "a dash of individuality is "formetimes necessary to give an interest."
- The fense is—"Concerning the nature of the Gods, and of the universe, nothing ever has been, or ever can be, clearly known by man. For should we even chance to guess the truth, we cannot know it to be the truth. All is mere opinion."

b Diog. Laert. IX. 18.

Παντα θεοις ανεθηκαν Όμης Φθ ΄ Ήσιοδ Φ τε, Όσσα πας ανθρωποισιν ονειδεα και ψογ Φ εςι, ΚΛΕΠΤΕΙΝ, ΜΟΙΧΕΥΕΙΝ τε, και ΑΛΛΗΛΟΥΣ ΑΠΑΤΕΥΕΙΝ .

By alluding to those other verses, where he descants on the uncertainty and obscurity of all inquiries relative to the nature of the Gods, and afferts, that all, on that subject, is mere conjecture and opinion, Aristotle seems, slily enough, to have intended to make Xenophanes answer himself; and to excuse Homer's theology, even by the testimony of one who had been most forward to condemn it. "These may be opinions taken up at random, as Xenophanes fays; and his representation of the Gods may be the true:—but, as he himself owns, these are matters not clearly known.—Axx" is $\sigma \alpha \phi \eta \tau \alpha \delta \varepsilon$.—Homer was therefore right, as a Poet, in following popular tradition and belief."

Aristotle also alludes here, without doubt, to the objections of Plato, De Repub. II. p. 150, &c. ed. Massey.

I cannot forbear to mention one curious maxim of Xenophanes about drinking, which we find in some pleasant elegiac lines preferved in Atheneus. It was his opinion, it seems, that no man had drunk too much, provided he was able to walk home without a guide.

And what fays the fevere and moral Plato on this subject?—
He forbids young men this indulgence, but allows it to old:—μεθης δε, και πολυοινία; τοπαραπαν ΤΟΝ ΝΕΟΝ ἀπεχεσθαι. Till the age of 18, he allows no wine; for, to drink it at that time of life, he says, is "adding fire to fire, both in body and mind."—πυρ ἐπι πυρ ὀχετευείν, ἐις τε το σωμα, και την ψυχην. From 18 to 30, a moderate use of wine might be allowed:—ἀινε γευεσθαι τε ΜΕΤΡΙΟΥ. At 40, and after, it might be used in a jolly kind of way—ἐις παιδιαν'——ἀςε

^c See the Poefis Philosophica of Hen. Stephens, p. 36, where other fragments of this philosopher are collected.

ανηθαν

οὐνηθαν ήμας, και δυσθυμιας ΛΗΘΗΝ γιγνεσθαι, μαλακωτερον ἐκ σκληςοτερε το της ψυχης ήθω, καθαπερ ἐις πυρ σιδηρον ἐντεθεντα, γιγνομενον και έτως ἐυπλαςοτερον ἐιναι. For wine, fays he, was given to man, as—φαρμακον——ἐπικερον της τε ΓΗΡΩΣ ἀυςηροτητω.— $Dc\ L_{i'g}$. II. p. 666. ed. Serr.

N O T E 239.

P. 125. WHETHER WHAT IS SAID, OR DONE, &c.

I believe Victorius is right in referring this to the accusation, or $\epsilon\pi\iota\iota\iota\mu\eta\sigma\iota\varsigma$, which Aristotle, at the end of the chapter, expresses by $\omega_s \beta\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon_{\varrho\alpha}$. "Arbitror autem rationem hanc pertinere ad formam eam, quam vocavit, $\omega_s \beta\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon_{\varrho\alpha}$. Docet enim nunc, si "poeta arguitur, quod personam aliquam induxerit, quæ quippiam "dixerit aut secerit, quod meritò reprehendi possit, aut speciem "habeat nocendi, quomodo illud desendi purgarique debeat." p. 278. It is true, the word $\beta\lambda\alpha\beta\epsilon_{\varrho\alpha}$ does not here occur: but Aristotle uses other words, as synonymous, at the conclusion of the chapter; as, $\mu\alpha\chi\theta\eta\varrho\alpha$, $\pi\alpha\eta\varrho\alpha$: and here, the same thing is sufficiently indicated by the moral expressions, $\mu\eta \kappa\alpha\lambda\omega\varsigma$, and $\varphi\alpha\nu\lambda\omega$. And though this solution cannot, that I see, be considered as arising from the application of any of the three principles laid down at the beginning of the chapter, yet it seems plainly connected, as I have observed in the notes on the translation, with what precedes.

N O T E 240.

P. 125. FOR THE SOLUTION OF SOME OBJECTIONS, WE MUST HAVE RECOURSE TO THE DICTION.

Τα δε, προς την λεξιν όρωντα δει διαλυεν. So, undoubtedly, the passage should be punctuated; not, as in some editions, very absurdly, τα δε προς την λεζιν, δραντα δει διαλυεν: of which the fair, and only fair, translation would be-" Those objections, which relate to the "diction, we must solve by looking at them"!" Goulston, who adopts this perverse construction, is forced to supply:-" his modis "intuentem:" and Heinfius has inferted έτως in his text; on what authority, I know not. But the true construction certainly is, έρωιτα προς την λεξιν—i. e. by having an eye to, or, confidering, "the diction." And fo the paffage was, long ago, well explained by Victorius; who was followed by Castelvetro, Piccolomini, and Beni.—Dacier, though he translates rightly, mistakes the sense with those, whose translation is wrong. He supposes Aristotle here to be fuggesting answers to objections against the diction. the inflances might have fet him right; none of them appearing to be criticisms on the diction, but, all of them, objections to the fense, though the answers are drawn from the diction. Indeed Dacier feems to have feen this, and is therefore forced to make the diction, Actis, include the thoughts, biavoiar; thus confounding Aristotle's clear distinction b.

In this whole chapter, words are considered no farther, than as they afford the means of obviating objections against the fense.

N O T E 241.

P. 126. WHEN ON THE TROJAN PLAIN HIS ANXIOUS EYE, &c.

The censure, here, is generally supposed to have sallen on the word alignous, and the absurdity of making Agamemnon see the Trojan camp, and the Grecian sleet, by night, and when he was [&]quot; Que vero ad dictionem pertinent, oportet intuentem folvere." Ed. Cantab. 1785.

b "La diction a deux parties; car elle comprend ordinairement les persées & l'ex-" pression." p. 468, note 27.

shut up in his tent. To this, Aristotle is understood to reply, that the word is metaphorical; he saw with his mind's eye.—For my part, I would much rather confess, that I do not understand the instance at all, than suppose the philosopher capable of thus explaining away one of the finest descriptive touches in the whole Iliad. The entire passage is this:

Ητοι 'οτ' ες πεδίου το Τρωϊκου άθρησειε, Θαυμαζεν πυρα πολλα, τα καιετο Ιλιοθι προ, Αυλων συριγγων τ' ενοπην, όμαδον τ' άνθρωπων.

II. K. v. 11.

I can hardly think it possible for any man, of the least taste, to read these lines, and understand them to express merely the thoughts of Agamemnon. Mr. Pope, who has shewn so much taste in making the most of all Homer's picturesque descriptions, has, in his translation, done ample justice to this. Yet, in the note, this cruel metaphorical sponge is applied, without compunction, upon the supposed authority of Aristotle; though, after all, the evident corruption and desciency of this whole passage leaves it dubious, whether this, or, indeed, any other meaning, assigned, or assignable, be the true one.

All, in this description, seems clearly literal. The verb, ἀθζησαι, is no where in Homer, I believe, applied to mental vision. Still less is θαυμαζεν applicable to mere thought, or recollection. And what, after all, is Agamemnon made to see? Only what he might easily see, even as he lay on his couch—the sires of the Trojan camp. Add to this, the sense still more evidently literal of what fol-

² See Diff. I. p. 31, &c.

b Il. X. v. 13. where, in the note, this explanation by metaphor is given with feeming acquiefcence. In Clarke's Homer, too, it is adopted, and άθρητειε is explained, animo videret: feeum circumspectaret. Κατα μεταροφαν είμηται. Ariflot. Poetic. cap. xxv."

lows—of his bearing the military music', and "the busy hum of "men."

There are few descriptions in Homer, that, to me, appear more beautiful than this little military night-scene. Whatever may be supposed with respect to Agamemnon, we, who read, are made to see, and bear. But, take away the literal fense, and you take away, with it, the whole beauty of the passage.—And, after all, what is the difficulty? Agamemnon, though retired to his tent, was kept awake by his anxiety. The enemy was not far off; and he apprehended the defign of some nocturnal incursion. In this situation, is it difficult to imagine, that he might frequently rife, and look with an anxious eye towards the Trojan camp, and towards the Thips?—for this is all which the expressions, $E\Sigma$ medion about $E\Sigma$ vnas ido:—here imply. Nor is it at all improbable, that he might have these views as he lay upon his bed, through windows, or apertures, made perhaps for that very purpose. The commentators feem to have thought only of a modern officer, fnugly flut up in a close and comfortable tent, and disturbed by no fear, but that of a fore throat, or the rheumatism. The tents of the antients were mere huts, or hovels. The marquee of Achilles himself, as it is minutely described by Homer', seems to have been little better than a cow-house.

As I have given the passage from Homer, the reader may not be displeased to compare that sketch with a far more finished and exquisite night-piece, but of the same kind, by our own great Poet.

Pope has expressed this, I think, in a very happy line:

"Hears in the passing wind their music blow."

Δυσμενεες δ' άνδρες σχεδον ειαται, έδε τι ίδμει, Μη πως και δια νυκτα μενοινησωσι μαχεσθαι.

v. 100, 101.

[&]quot;Trojanis temporibus, tentoria nondum crant lintea. Achivorum หมดเหม slipi-"tihus lignisque constahant, vimine intertexto, humoque aggesta; adeoque tuguria potius." Heyne ad Virgil. Æn. 1. Excurs. 16.

 $^{^{\}epsilon}$ II. Ω . 449. Pope's transl, XXIV, 553, and the note.

From camp to camp, through the foul womb of night,
The hum of either army stilly founds,
That the fix'd centinels almost receive
The secret whispers of each other's watch:
Fire answers fire; and through their paly stames
Each battle sees the other's umber'd face:
Steed threatens steed, in high and boastful neighs,
Piercing the night's dull ear; and from the tents,
The armourers, accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation.

Henry V. Ast iv.

N O T E 242.

P. 127. Αυλων συριγγωνθ' όμαδον.—II. Κ. v. 13.

-So Aristotle. In our editions of Homer, the whole line is - Αυλων συριγγων τ' ενοπην, όμαδον τ' άνθρωπων.

I cannot agree with those commentators who take the objection here to fall upon the word evory, which means, voice, "& ne se "dit proprement," says Dacier, "que des hommes." This would be a mere verbal objection; for the meaning is plain enough. But Aristotle, as I have already observed, is not here considering criticisms on the diction, but, such criticisms on the diction, or thoughts, as may be obviated by means of the diction.

Farther; he is here shewing, how objections may be removed by having recourse to metaphor—by saying, "the expression is "not to be taken in its proper, but, in its metaphorical sense." But Dacier's explanation makes the objection to be, not the impropriety of the literal sense, (for that was out of the question here), but only the impropriety, or harshness, of the metaphor; and the answer, according to him, is no other, than a denial of the charge, and a justification of the metaphor. And this will be equally equally the case, whether we take Aristotle's quotation as it stands—συριγγων θ' δμαδον—or suppose him to mean, συριγγων τ' ἐνοπην, as we read it in our editions: except, that the former would be much the bolder and harsher metaphor of the two.

So much then for, what the criticism was not. What it was, must always, I fear, in the present condition of the text, remain a problem. One conjecture only occurs to me, and that, fuch as I cannot take upon me to offer with any degree of confidence. Perhaps Aristotle had, originally, quoted, or meant, at least, to refer to, the whole verse, as we read it; and the censure might be pointed at the expression-OMAΔON τ' ανθρωπων. The proper and derivative fense of ouaso seems to be that of a crowd, a multitude, a beap : its fecondary fense, by a common metonymy of cause for effect, the murmur, or tumult, occasioned by a multitude. So Hesychius: $O_{\mu\alpha\delta}$ O_{μ TAPAXOΣ.—ΣΤΡΑΤΟΣ, απο τε, όμε.—Perhaps, then, fome hypercritic might take, or chuse to take, the word here in its primary fense, of multitude, and ask, how Agamemnon could, by night, perceive, and " wonder at," the multitude of men? θαυμαζεν-όμα-Σου ανθρωπων. Το this it would be a proper answer, to say—you mistake the meaning of the word ouador: it is not used here in its proper fense, of a multitude, but, in its metaphorical fense, for the effect produced by the voices and the bustle of a multitude. criticism, I confess, would be frivolous enough; yet not more so than many others, to which Aristotle has condescended to furnish answers. It will perhaps be thought a more folid objection to my conjecture, that the word, ouado, feems to be constantly used by Homer in the fecondary fense. So, Il. M. 471.—B. 96.—Od. K. 556: Κιτυμενών δ' έταρων ΟΜΑΔΟΝ ΚΑΙ ΔΟΥΠΟΝ ΑΚΟΥΣΑΣ. can I fay, that I have found any instance in Homer, of this word used in its primary sense. The other sense may, therefore, appear too common and cstablished to have admitted of any difficulty. But to this circumstance, a critic, disposed to cavil, and furnished with sufficient authorities for the primary sense from other authors, may easily be imagined to have paid no regard.

² In the Orphean Argonautics, v. 112, ψαμαθε ΌΜΑΔΟΣ, occurs, for "a heap of "fand," Apollon. Rhodius uses the word in the same sense as, I. 347. IV. 198.

N O T E 243.

P. 127. ALL, IS PUT FOR MANY -.

ΤΟ γαρ ΠΑΝΤΕΣ, ἀντι τε Πολλε, κατα μεταφοραν ἐιοηται. The word, παντες, does not occur in any of the preceding examples. But, fays M. Batteux, it is virtually contained in the first example—ΑΛΛΟΙ μεν ρα θεοι τε και ἀνερες, &c.—for ἀλλοι means ΠΑΝΤΕΣ ἀλλοι. "Aristote traduit l'idée, & non le mot." Dacier understands the passage in the same manner. This explanation appears to me forced and improbable. Aristotle says plainly, ΤΟ παντες—ἐιρηται—i. e. "the word παντες;" and I believe, with Victorius, Piccolomini, and Heinsius, that some corresponding example is lost, as the explanations of the other examples appear to be likewise.

N O T E 244.

Ρ. 127. ΔΙΔΟΜΕΝ δε δι ευχω άρεσθαι.

Και το περι το ένυπνιον τε Αγαμεμνον. ότι ΟΥΚ ΑΥΤΟΣ ό Ζευς έιπεν—διδομεν δε όι έυχ. άφεσθαι.

αλλα ΤΩ: ΕΝΥΠΝΙΩ: ΕΝΕΤΕΛΛΕΤΟ διδοναι.—De Soph. Elench. p. 284, ed. Duval.—This clearly confirms the common explanation, which makes Hippias substitute διδόμεν, the infinitive, (for διδομεναι,) used imperatively, instead of δίδομεν, the first person plural of the present tense.

A very curious folution this. Jupiter tells no lie. He only orders the dream to lie for him: "Ce qui est trés différent," says Dacier; " car alors le mensonge ne vient pas de Jupiter, il vient "du fonge."—Dacier tells us also, that this hemistich, which does not appear in our copies of Homer^a, was altered, "par une fraude " picuse." I cannot see any great piety in the fraud; because nothing appears to be added to the impiety of the passage by the words objected to, or to be taken from it, by the suppression of them. If the words were in Ariftotle's Homer, they were probably in Plato's alfo. Yet, in the passage at the end of the second book of his Republic, where he alludes to this part of Homer, he, very properly, takes no notice of these words, but censures the whole circumstance, of Jupiter's being represented as sending such a deceitful dream: -- την τε ενυπνιε ΠΟΜΠΗΝ ύπο Δι τω Αγαμεμvovib. - The theology, indeed, of this charming writer, was of a very different complexion from that of Hippias, or of Dacier .--Κομιδη άρα δ ΘΕΟΣ άπλευ και άληθες, εν τε έργω, και έν λογω και έτε αυτ το μεθιζαται, έτε άλλες έξαπατα, έτε κατα φαντασιας, έτε κατα λογες, έτε κατα σημεων πομπας, εθ' ύπαρ, εδ' όναρ.

N O T E 245.

Ρ. 127. Το μεν ΟΥ καταπυθεται ομβρω.

This correction, also, of Hippias, is somewhat more explicitly mentioned, De Soph. Elench. p. 284. The passage was censured as absurd, (ως ἀτοπως ἐιφηκοτα) by those critics who read ε. But what the absurdity was, we are not told by Aristotle. His com-

² Instead of it, we read—Τρωεσσι δε μηδε' έφηπται. //. Β. 15.—See Clarke's note.

D P. 154 ed. Maff.

c Ibid.

mentators tell us, that it confished in first calling the post "dry," dvov, and then saying—"where it was rotted by rain." I cannot say I comprehend this. Are rottenness and dryness, as Beni very well asks, incompatible?—Nor is it clear, what construction, or what sense, was given to the passage, by those who read &, instead of &.—But the reader will hardly thank me for detaining him with a differtation upon a rotten post.

N O T E 246.

P. 128. AND MIX'D BEFORE UNMIX'D.

Ζωρα τε τα πριν ΑΚΡΗΤΑ, [διαλλαττοντα κελευθες: for so the verse is completed, in Simplicius and Athenaus.] This seems the best and most authentic reading, and Dacier's the most reasonable explanation. The meaning of the words, ζωρον, ζωροτερον, was matter of great dispute among the antients themselves. See Plutarch's Sympos. Prob. V. 4.—Μ. Batteux, taking it to mean pure, unmixed, reads, consistently with that idea, for ἀκρητα, ΚΕΚΡΑΤΟ. But, that this word, whatever it was, meant unmixed, seems plain from the passage of Athenaus, p. 423, 424, about Theophrassus; who, it seems, in a treatise on drunkenness, adduced these very lines of Empedocles to prove, that the meaning of ζωροτερον was, not pure wine, but wine mixed with water.

The expression, διαλλαττοντα κελευθες, seems to prove, as Dacier has explained it, that the second verse was not intended merely as explanatory repetition, in other terms, of the change described in the first, but as descriptive of a contrary change; an interpretation which is somewhat supported by the two following lines of the same Poet, on the same subject:——

a The lines are

Επικε ξυλου ἀυου, όσοι τ΄ δργυί, ύπερ ὰιν., Η δρυ \mathfrak{G} , ή πευκης, το μευ \mathfrak{s} καταπιζεται όμβρμ.

II. ψ. 327. ΑΛΛΟΤΕ ΑΛΛΟΤΕ μεν, φιλοτητι συνερχομεν' εις εν άπαντα, ΑΑΛΟΤΕ δ'ΑΥ, διχ' έκαςα φορευμενα νεικε εχθει'.

—and, perhaps, still better, by the lines quoted by Aristotle, Phys. Auscult. VIII. p. 408. The expression—MAΘΟΝ ἀθανατ' ἐιναι—is well explained by Casaubon, upon Athenæus, p. 718,—" μαθον, " pro ἐιωθεισαν, aut ἐπεφυπεισαν:—didicerant esse, pro erant, vel sole-" bant, esse," &c. See also the verses just referred to, in the Phys. Auscult. where the same expression occurs—MEMAΘΗΚΕ φυεσθαι.

Of dialgeois and ourdeois, and the ambiguity of punctuation, as a fource of forhiftical argumentation, more may be seen, if it be thought worth seeing, Rhet. II. 24, p. 580. De Soph. Elench. p. 284, 288, 303, ed. Duval.

N O T E 247.

P. 128. To AMBIGUITY ---

Αμφιβολια. i. e. fuch ambiguity, as does not depend on the different senses of fingle words, (which Aristotle calls ὁμωνυμια,) but on the different senses, of which two or more words are capable, independently of their punctuation. See, De Soph. Elench. I. cap. iv. which clears up his distinctions, between διαιφεσις, ἀμφιβολια, ὁμωνυμια, &c.

N O T E 248.

P. 128. Whatever is poured out to drink as wine.

Upon v_s 363 of Od. Ω. (—κερωντας αἰθοπα οἰνον—) Eustathius says—τετες ιν, εμβαλλοντας εἰς κρατηρας: and Gataker remarks, on occasion

2 Poef. Philof. H. Steph. p. 21.

occasion of the same passage—" το κεραν, sive κερασαι, licet miscere "proprie significet, usurpatur tamen simpliciter αντι τε, εγχεων, και "διδοναι πινων pro infundere, in calicem scil. sive cyathum, et biben-" dum porrigere *." As a proof that the verb was so used, without the idea of mixing, we meet with it applied to nectar:

--ΚΕΡΑΣΣΕ δε νεκταρ έουθρον.

Od. E. 93.

The Gods hardly drank nectar and water.—But it is even applied to pure water itself:

Θυμηρες ΚΕΡΑΣΑΣΑ κατα κρατώ τε και ώμων.
i. e. pouring it over my head and shoulders. Od. K. 362.

N O T E 249.

P. 128. HENCE GANYMEDE, &c.

I have adhered, without scruple, to the transposition mentioned in Mr. Winstanley's note '; which had been proposed, I know not by whom, before Victorius published his commentary. Victorius opposes it; but, I think, without sufficient reason. Piccolomini saw, and has well defended, the necessity of it, which appears to me to be obvious. I would read the whole passage thus: Τα δε, κατα το εθω της λεξεως δίου, του [forte, TO] κεκραμμενου, δίνου φασιν είναι όθεν είρηται ὁ Γανυμηδης,

 Δii οινοχοευείν, έ πινοντων δίνον. Ειη δ' αν τυτο γε και κατα μεταφοραν. Και, Χαλκεας, τυς τον σιδηρον εργαζομενυς όθεν πεποιηται, Κνημις νεοτευκτε κασσιτεχοιο.

This differs from Mr. Winstanley's arrangement, only with respect to the words—είη δ' ἀν τυτο γε, &c. which appear to me to be-

* See Clarke's Homer.

* Ed. Ox. 1780, p. 307.

3 X 2

long

long to the fingle example immediately preceding them in the editions. The commentators agree, I think, in making them refer to all the examples. But I cannot be perfuaded, that Aristotle, after formally proposing the êθ λεξεως, as a distinct solution, would immediately say, that all the instances he gives might as well be defended κατά μεταφοραν. I understand him to say—" though this " example, indeed, may also be defended by metaphor." The expression confirms this:—ἐνη δ' ἀν ΤΟΥΤΟ ΓΕ και κατα μεταφοραν.

Besides, there seems to be a pretty plain reason, why this instance might be considered as a metaphor, and the others not so. NeEtar was the wine of the Gods; and the refemblance was fufficiently obvious, to make the substitution of the one for the other an easy metaphor. With the other examples the case is different. Brass and iron are indeed, each of them, species of metals. common genus is too general to constitute that obvious resemblance which is requifite to a metaphor. Their likeness, to use the philosopher's own language, is not perceived by the genus. Oil and vinegar are both liquids; yet the fubflitution of the one for the other would make a very strange fort of metaphor; because they have no other resemblance to each other, but as liquids. Hence, Aristotle denominates such substitutions not metaphors, but customary modes of speech; both because the resemblance is not obvious enough for metaphor, and because, as the name implies, they are common and established expressions, (κυρια,) however, in themselves, improper.

b See NOTE 183.

N O T E 250.

P. 129. THE MEANING IS, WAS STOPPED ONLY, OR RE-

Dacier supposes the critics to have objected to the improbability of a long spear's remaining fixed in a shield, like an arrow, or light dart. I cannot so conceive it. The lines themselves are the best comment here.

Όυδε τοτ' Αινειαο δαϊφρον δοβριμον έγχο.

Ρηζε σακο. χρυσω γαρ έρυκακε, δωρα θεοιο.
Αλλα δυω μεν έλασσε δια πτυχας, αι δ' αρ' έτι τρεις
Ησαν. έπει πεντε πτυχας ήλατε Κυλλοποδιων, Τας δυο, χαλκειας, δυο δ' ένδοθι, κασσιτεροιο,
Την δε μιαν, χρυσην. τη ρ' έσχετο χαλκειον έγχο.

ΙΙ. Υ. 267, &c.

The shield was composed of five plates; the two first, of brass; the two innermost, next the body, (for that seems to be the sense of $\partial \partial \partial u^a$,) of tin, $\kappa \alpha \sigma \sigma \iota \tau \varepsilon \rho \circ \iota \sigma^b$; and one in the middle, of gold; and there the spear was stopped: The $\partial^a \partial u \kappa \varepsilon \tau \sigma$. Now this might mean, fluck, or, was fastened, in it. But this, it was objected, would have been a manifest contradiction; for Homer had said, not only

- ² It may, however, mean—within the brass plates. If so, we must understand the two external plates, on the opposite sides of the shield, to have been brass, and the two iron, within, and contiguous to, them. In either case, the plate of gold will be the third and middle plate.
 - Meaning, I suppose, according to the ἐθ⑤- λεξεως, iron.
- * As, by the way, the same word clearly appears to mean in a similar passage, It. H. 248. But, there, it is used with the proposition is.

Έξ δε δια πτυχας ήλθε δαίζων χαληΦ κτειρης, ΕΝ τη δ' έβδοματη ρίνο ΣΧΕΤΟ. that the gold flopped it— χ_{ℓ} or χ_{ℓ} of the plates, and that the three others remained unpierced. But the spear could not well be fixed, or fastened, in the plate of gold, which was the third, without piercing it.—And thus the objection appears to have been rightly understood by Victorius and Goulston.

N O T E 251.

P. 129. OF HOW MANY DIFFERENT SENSES, &c.

I may fay with Victorius, "hic locus valde me torfit." The words are these:—το δε, ποταχως ενδεχεται, ώδι πως μαλις ἀν τις ὑπολαβοι κατα την κατ' ἀντικου.—In this passage, as in many others, there is just glimpse enough of some meaning, to mock a commentator with the hopes of discovery, and to deprive him of the comfort of doing at once, what, after all his efforts, he will probably find himself obliged to do at last—of abandoning the passage as unintelligible. For my own part, I do not see one clear and satisfactory sense, that can be made of the words, without conjectural emendation; and if we open that door, we shall be, again, confounded by the number of different senses which ingenuity may propose, with equal pretensions to our acceptance.

Dacier translates thus: "Et le plus court moyen de se tirer de ces endroits, c'est de prendre le mot dans un sens tout contraire à celui qu'on lui donne ordinairement." Piccolomini and Beni understand it thus: "How many senses a word admits of, may best be known by considering the significations opposed to it:" a sense presente, I think, at least, to any other that has been offered, because it certainly does receive some support from the 15th chapter of Aristotle's sirst book of Topics'; where he treats of Homonymy, or equivocation, and points out différent means, by which we may discover, what, and how many, different senses a word will admit of; and among these is the rule here supposed to be alluded to; i. e. that any single word must admit of as many different signissications as are opposed to it. As, for example, to the word acute, we oppose, sometimes grave, sometimes blunt, sometimes dull, or stupid. Acute therefore has, of course, three different senses, corresponding to those three opposite senses.

But though this explanation of the passage must be allowed to give an Aristotelic meaning, yet I cannot think it a meaning that arises, fairly and clearly, from the text. In particular, the expresfion, KATA την [scil. σημασιαν—for so it is supplied—] KAT' AN-TIKPY, has, to me, a very fuspicious appearance. I much doubt, whether Aristotle would have used the word artingu to denote contrariety of meaning, or any thing but local opposition. I believe he would have used Evantion, or antimemenon; as he does constantly in those parts of his logical works, where he treats of contrariety, and of the opposite senses of words b; and where I have not found the phrase, nat' antingu, once made use of in that sense.—However, as this interpretation feems to be the least exceptionable of any, and I fee nothing better to propose, I have admitted it in my version: but I should certainly not accuse any reader of being very fastidious, if he preferred a blank to this, or any other meaning, that has been given to this dark faying.—Emendatory conjectures, indeed, have occurred to me, as to others; but none of them plaufible enough even to impose upon myself.

[•] See Topic I. 15, above referred to; and, II. 7, 8, et passim.

N O T E 252.

P. 129. ARGUE FROM THESE PREVIOUS DECISIONS OF THEIR OWN.

Αυτο: ΚΑΤΑΨΗΦΙΣΑΜΕΝΟΙ.—I cannot think this word fo free from all difficulty as Mr. Winstanley does. He fays, "Egregie " dictum καταψηφισαμενοι, ut fensus sit: hi perinde ac judices qui-" dam decernentes ratiocinantur," &c .- But the question is, whether the word will admit that fense, or any other, than that of condemning, passing sentence against, &c. which is not to Aristotle's purpose in this place. The fair sense of καταψηφισαμενο: συλλογιζονται, is, if I mistake not, "they argue, or form their conclusion, after, " or, in consequence of, having condemned"—what?—We must neceffarily understand them to have condemned, either the passage in question, or, the opinion of others about the sense of it. But Aristotle, in what follows, says plainly, that they condemned the passage, or the opinions of others relative to it, in consequence of . their own preconceived and erroneous notions; and the idea of condemnation, or censure, here, would be only an awkward, tautological anticipation of the ΕΠΙΤΙΜΩΣΙΝ, αν υπεναντιον ή τη άυτων in the proposed correction of Heinsius, καταΣΟφισαμενοι, must be allowed the praise, both of ingenuity and probability. In my version, however, I have contented myfelf with making the best I could of that reading which has the authority of all the manuscripts, and all the commentators, except Heinflus, on its fide.—Victorius thinks the word will bear the fense of "cum sententiam tulerint;" but he adds-" quamvis in præpositione, quæ verbo adjuncta est, vis " infit contra alios id faciendi."

N O T E 253.

P. 130. THE OBJECTION ITSELF, THEREFORE, IS PRO-BABLY FOUNDED ON A MISTAKE.

Δι άμαρτημα δε το προβλημα είκ εςι. "Metuo ne hic locus cor"ruptus mancufve fit." Victor.—To give these words any meaning that may not easily be controverted, is, I believe, impossible. I have made them say, what it seems to me most probable that the author meant to say: "So far is this criticism from proving Homer" to be wrong, that it is, itself, probably, sounded on a mistake."

N O T E 254.

P. 130. THE IMITATIONS OF POETRY SHOULD RESEMBLE THE PAINTINGS OF ZEUXIS—.

Τοιετες δ' είναι, διες Ζευξις εγραφεν, άλλα και προς το βελτιον' το γαρ παραδειγμα δει ύπερεχειν.

M. Batteux proposes this arrangement:—Αλλα και προς το βελτιον το γαρ παραδειγμα δει υπερεχειν, τοικτις δ' είναι, δικς Ζευξις εγραφεν.

That the words, τοι ετες δ' ἐνναι, διες Ζευζις ἐγραφεν, belong to the fecond way of defending the impossible, by referring it to the βελτιον —δια δει ἐνναι, &c. seems clear. Nor is it any objection to this, as some have thought it, that Aristotle had before mentioned the paintings of Zeuxis, as deficient in the expression of the manners. For it by no means follows, from this desiciency of Zeuxis as to

- * So, at least, the passage is printed in the edition I use of M. Batteux's Quarre Foetiques, (Paris 1771,) not as they are quoted by Mr. Winstanley, p. 309.
 - See Goulston's version and notes.
 - · Cap. vi. Transl. p. 77.

manners, that he did not represent προς το βελτιον, with respect to beauty, grace, dignity of form⁴, &c.: and it seems to be this kind of improvement, in painting, by which Aristotle, here and elsewhere, illustrates the μιμησις βελτιον of poetry. Compare, particularly, cap. xv. Επα δε μιμησις ές ι ή Τραγ. βελτ. &c.

The story of the manner, in which Zeuxis is said to have collected the βελτιον for his samous picture of Helen, is well known. See Cic. de Invent. II. 1. Plin. Nat. Hist. XXXV. 9. Bayle, art. Zeuxis.

Tagree, therefore, perfectly with Mr. Winstanley, that the words, τοιετες δ' είναι δίες Ζ. εγο. should be transposed: but I do not see, that any alteration, farther than the mere transposition, is necessary. I would read—Αλλα και προς το βελτιον [scil. δα αναγαν] τοιετες δ' είναι [scil. δει] δίες Ζευξίς εγοαφεν το γαρ παραδαγμα δα ύπε-ρεχαν.

N O T E 255.

P. 130. To opinion, or what is said to be, may be referred, &c.

Προς & φασι, τα ἀλογα: [scil. δει ἀναγεν:] for so, I think, with Mr. Winstanley, the passage is to be understood; and so it is explained and translated by Castelvetro. The expression, & φασι, or δια φασι, is used by Aristotle as synonymous with δοξα, and δια δοκει. Thus, — δια ΦΑΣΙ και ΔΟΚΕΙ, at the beginning of this chapter: and afterwards— ετω φασιν.

But it will not, I think, be found possible to give this passage a consistent sense, unless we understand him to mean, what, as the d Zeuxis plus membris corporis dedit, id amplius atque augustius ratus, atque (ut existimant,) Homerum secutus, cui validissima qua que forma, ctiam in seminis, placet. Quintil. XII. 10. p. 627, ed. Gibs.

^{*} Transl. p. 94.

text stands, he does not expressly fay, i. e.—" By general opinion "we may excuse, not only the πιθανον αδυνατον, but even such things "as are manifestly improbable, or absurd." As if he had written, προς ά φασι, ΚΑΙ τα άλογα. And thus Goulston has supplied:—" Ad ea quæ aiunt, [rediguntur bæc quæ dixi; et] illa, quæ sine ra"tione sunt."

N O T E 256.

P. 131. WHEN THINGS ARE SAID, WHICH APPEAR TO BE CONTRADICTORY—.

Τα δ' ὑπεναντια ὡς εἰρημενα—. The words, ὡς εἰρημενα, have diftressed all the commentators; and no sense, which they have laboured to force upon the expression, is, to my apprehension, satisfactory. Heinsius corrected by transposition—Τα δ' ὡς ὑπεναντια εἰρημενα: "Ea, quæ tanquam subcontraria dicta videntur."—An éasier and more probable emendation, I think, would be—Τα δ' ΥΠΕΝΑΝΤΙΩΣ εἰρημενα.

N O T E 257.

P. 131. AND IN THE SAME SENSE ...

The word is, ωσαυτως: "fimili modo," as all the commentators render it. I cannot fay I have been able thoroughly to fatisfy myself, as to the precise meaning of the expression, from any thing I have found in Aristotle's logical works. If, "in the same "manner," does not mean, "in the same sense," I confess I do not know what it means. I understand Aristotle to say, that, if the subject of the propositions, charged with being contradictory, be the fame, and spoken of in the same respect, we must still examine, farther, whether the two propositions admit of a sense really and accurately opposite to each other; which cannot be the case, unless the same words, in each proposition, have exactly the same sense. And this meaning seems to be supported by the following passage from the treatise Περι Ερμηνειας:—Και εςω τυτο ΑΝΤΙΦΑΣΙΣ, (nempe) καταφασις και ἀποφασις άι ἀντικειμεναι. Λεγω δε ἀντικεισθαι, την ΤΟΥ ΑΥΤΟΥ κατα ΤΟΥ ΑΥΤΟΥ, μη ΌΜΩΝΥΜΩΣ δε b. That is, as it is well explained in the analytical Synopsis prefixed to Duval's edition:—" Affirmatio & negatio oppositæ, contradictionem faciunt. "Oppositio est ejusdem, de codem, non homonymè; nam accipi de"bent termini in oppositione, EODEM MODO AC SENSU."

• See De Sophist. Elench. 285, D. 287, E.

All that follows—viz. ώς ε και αυτον, ή προς α αυτ Αεγα, ή ο αν φρονιμών ὑποθηται—is either so corrupt, or so darkly expressed, that I have only to confess myself unable even to guess what Aristotle meant to fay. Commentators indeed have explained, and translators have translated; but I have seen no explanation that approaches to fatisfaction, nor any translation, but what is either unintelligible, or unwarrantable, or both. I do not mean to except myself; for I had translated thus:- "We must also con-"fider the person who speaks, and whether the contradiction be to " what he himself said, or to what any reasonable man would un-" derstand him to have said"." But, to wave other objections, which, no doubt, the learned reader will eafily make for me, the verb, ὑποθεσθαι, will, I believe, by no means bear this fense, of supposing, understanding—υπολαβαν. At least, Aristotle seems always to use it in that of advising, suggesting, &c. So Rhet. I. 9, ρ. 533. - όταν ἐπαινειν βελη, όςα τι ἀν ΥΠΟΘΟΙΟ και όταν ΥΠΟΘΕΣ-ΘΑΙ, όρα τι αν επαινεσειας. Accordingly, Goulston has given the

Cap. vi. p. 39. Elsewhere he expresses this—ἐλεγχ το μεν γαρ ἐςιν ἀντιφασις το αυτο και ἐν Φ, ΜΗ 'ΟΝΟΜΑΤΟΣ, ΑΛΛΑ ΠΡΑΓΜΑΤΟΣ. De Soph. Elench. p. 285, D.

Alluding, as I supposed, to the former passage about the verbal ὑπεναντια; and Glauco's answer, viz. the contradiction is only to the critic's erroneous opinion, and miscenception, of the passage: ἀλογως πρεϋπολαμβανεσι.
word word this fense in his version:—" videndumque, an eâ in re, " quod prudens præceperit, secutus sit." But, of what force this circumstance is, or how it is to be applied to obviate the charge of contradiction, I do not see.

Being therefore obliged to reject the only version, which seemed to me to offer any tolerable meaning, I have left a blank in my translation.

N O T E 258.

P. 131. WHEN EXCUSED BY NO NECESSITY, &c.

— Όταν μη αναγκης έσης, μηθεν χρησηται τω αλογω, ώσπες Ευζιπιδης τω Αιγαητε πονηςια, ώσπες εν Οςεςη τε Μενελαε.—Such was the confused state in which Robortelli found the text, which he, very ingeniously and solidly, rectified thus:

— Όταν μη ἀναγκης έσης μηθεν, χρησηται τω ἀλογω, ώσπερ Ευριπίδης ΕΝ τω ΑΙΓΕΙ ΤΗι πονηρια, ώσπερ εν τω Ορεςη τε Μενελακ.

Some MSS. for Αιγείητε, give Αιγείητη, which, as Goulston has observed, suggests the true reading—εν τω ΑΙΓΕΙ, Ή ΤΗι πονηφία—κ. τ. λ.

By the Ægeus, Robortelli understood the character of that name, in the Medea of Euripides. To this Victorius very reasonably objected, that the mode of expression, in the Arges, seems plainly to indicate a Tragedy so named; not a character only in a Tragedy of a different name. But this is no objection to Robortelli's reading, though it is to his explanation of it. See the fragments at the end of the Oxford Euripides, where several passages of the Ægeus are quoted from Stobæus, &c.

N O T E 259.

P. 131. Thus the sources of objections are five, &c.

The objections answered by considerations drawn from the diction, (Soct. 5.) appear to be all reducible to one or other of these five sources.

N O T E 260.

P. 131. OR, OF IMMORAL TENDENCY.

Βλαβερα: i. e. hurtful on account of their immoral tendency. So the word is used by Plato; to whose objections, and to the very language in which he expresses them, Aristotle so frequently alludes. Censuring the immoral tendency of some of Homer's representations

[•] See NOTE 235.

See the passage from Plato in the next NOTE, where both these expressions occur.

representations of his hero Achilles, Plato says—Ουθ όσια ταυτα, ετ' αληθη:——και μην τοις γε ακεεσι ΒΛΑΒΕΡΑ:—The reason follows: πας γαρ έαυτω συγγνωμην έξει, κακω έντι, πεισθεις, ώς άρα τοιαυτα πραττεσι τε και έπραττον "Οι θεων αγχισποροι—…." Ων ένεκα, παυςεον τες τοιετες μυθες, μη ήμιν πολλην ευχερειαν έντικτωσι τοις νεοις, πουηριας. De Rep. III. p. 176, ed. Mass.

Compare the precept, cap. xv^a. about making the character as morally good as possible: and see Note 108. It is obvious however to observe, that when the μοχθηρια, the villainy of a character, is overcharged, it brings with it its own antidote. Such characters as Iago^b, or Glenalvon, can be βλαβερα to no reader or spectator. They excite only pure and unmitigated disgust. Not all the art of the Poet, or the charms of Poetry, can cheat us into any degree of sympathy with them, even for the moment in which they are speaking. We feel, there, no such struggle between immoral approbation and moral indignation, as Dr. Johnson has described, in his observations upon the different effects produced on the spectator, by the villainy of Rowe's Lothario, and that of Richardson's Lovelace. The passage is so much to the purpose of this note, so justly thought, and so well expressed, that I am persuaded I shall gratify the reader by transcribing it.

"The character of Lothario seems to have been expanded by Richardson into Lovelace; but he has excelled his original in the moral effect of the siction. Lothario, with gaiety which cannot be hated, and bravery which cannot be despised, retains too much of the spectator's kindness. It was in the power of Richardson alone to teach us at once esteem and detestation, to make virtuous resentment overpower all the benevolence which

[•] Transl. p. 92.

b "There is always danger, left wickedness, conjoined with abilities, should "steal upon esteem, though it misses of approbation; but the character of Iago is so "conducted, that he is, from the first scene to the Iast, hated and despised." [Dr. Johnson. Note at the end of Othello.]—Not so, Shakspeare's Richard.

"wit, and elegance, and courage, naturally excite, and to lose at last the hero in the villain."

N O T E 261.

P. 131. OR AS CONTRARY TO TECHNICAL ACCURACY.

Παρα την ἐςθοτητα, την κατα τεχνην. Most of the commentators understand the art of Poetry itself. But, if I am right in the explanation I have given, NOTE 233, of the expression, προς ἀυτην την τεχνην, the sense of the expression here must be the same. I understand Aristotle to mean, the rightness, not of Poetry itself, but of other arts, which may be incidentally the subject of the Poetry; and the words, I think, express the source, or ἐιδω, as he terms it, of objections relative to all faults κατα συμβεβηκω, as opposed to those, which he distinguishes by the various expressions of, ἀμαρτιαι καθ ἑαυτην, &c.*.

The other interpretation of the words is fairly liable, I think, to the following objections. 1. If we understand the poetic art itself to be meant, then the objection to faults nata supples of to impossibilities and inaccuracies with respect to other arts and sciences—will be entirely omitted in this enumeration. This is very improbable, considering how common a source of critical censure this was. For while, on the one hand, the extravagant admirers of Homer made no scruple to assert, that his Poems contained the principles of all arts and sciences; on the other, we know how eagerly the Zoilists caught at every apparent inaccuracy of this kind; and, particularly, with respect to his geography. One instance, at least, of this fort of cavil, we have in this chapter: the censure of the passage, One of all arts of cavil, we have in this chapter:

١.

Lives of the Poets, vol. ii. 526.

Sec NOTE 233.

Homer's ignorance of aftronomy b.-2. By the manner in which Aristotle here mentions, first, the five sources of critical censures, and then, immediately, the twelve fources of hurses or anfevers, it is plain, I think, that he means—answers to those censures, and to all of them. But this cannot be the case, if we understand effential faults in the Poetry itself, or bad imitation: for this admits of no answer, but a direct denial of the sact. Whereas, if we understand incidental errors in other arts, all will be confisent; and every fault enumerated will find its answer in some of the λυσεις, which had been pointed out in the preceding part of the chapter, and are referred to in this enumeration. -3. If the art here mentioned be the art of Peetry itself, and the faults against that art be, as I understand them to be, effential faults, faults which constitute bad Poetry, i. e. in Aristotle's view, bad imitation, this plainly implies, that the four other faults enumerated are not effential, but accidental faults; κατα συμβεβηνώ. But, that juch faults as improbability, and immorality, (ἀλογα, βλαβερα,) which had just before been fingled out from the rest, as έρθαι ἐπιτιμητεις—as the most folid objections, and such as admitted of no excuse—that these should be considered by Aristotle as faults merely incidental, not to be objected to the Poetry itself, not affecting the merit of the imitation, ε καθ' ΈΑΥΤΗΝ άμαρτιαι, is what, as I have before faid, I cannot eafily conceive. c.

The expression itself—παρα την ερθοτητα την κατα τεχνην, is indeed ambiguous; and they, who prefer the sense which I have rejected, will perhaps think it savoured by the similar expression, clearly applied to saults against the art of Poetry itself, in the passage,—ποτερων ές: το άμαρτημα, των ΕΑΤΑ ΤΗΝ ΤΕΧΝΗΝ, ή κατ' άλλο συμβεξην. Τhe expressions, however, are not exactly the same. There, it is, κατα ΤΗΝ τεχνην—" against the art:" here,—κατα b For instances of such objections, both to the geography, and the astronomy, of Homer, the reader may consult Strabo, passim.

^{*} Note 233.

region: "contrary to the restitude of art."—But Aristotle had before used an expression, that seemed still more strongly to point at the art of Poetry: τω προς ΑΥΤΗΝ ΤΗΝ ΤΕΧΝΗΝ αδυνατα: which, however, it seems necessary, for the reasons given in NOTE 233, to understand in the same sense, which I have here given to κατα τεχισι. But that passage, and indeed this rubole chapter, is, in its present state, so full of obscurity and ambiguity, that every interpretation which can be given must necessarily be, in a great measure, conjectural and disputable. All I can venture to be consident of is, that my explanation of this passage is consistent with my explanation of the other; and that either both are right, or both are wrong.

N O T E 262.

P. 131. The Answers, which are twelve, &c.

How the different Auris or folutions proposed throughout the chapter are reducible to 12, and which are the 12 that Aristotle meant, are questions, which the desective state of the original renders it very dissipation, if not impossible, to answer, with any certainty. And indeed the matter is of so little importance, that it is by no means worth while to enter into any examination of the various modes of reckoning, by which disserent expositors have endeavoured to solve the problem. Victorius, indeed, is so wise, as to give up the attempt. It will be very casy however, and therefore, I hope, not very soolish, just to enumerate all the Aures, which actually have been mentioned in the chapter, in the order in which they occur, and then to examine, by way of experiment, whether they are any way reducible to twelve.

1.—τυγχωνει τυ τελυς, τυ άυτης.—i. e. The end of Poetry is better answered, &c.

2.— κατα συμβεβηκ© - - - The fault is incidental.
*
3.—οια

3. — δια δει, (Or, βελτιον) -	It i	is what is best, or what
3,, (, ,)		Should be.
4.—δια φασι, (Or, δια δοκει)	•	is according to general
4 , (32, 322 2000)		opinion.
5.—δια ην, η έξιν (or, έτως έιχ
[6 σκεπτεον - εις τον πραττοντ	τα, προς έν, έτ	e, &c.] - [Confider cir., ., ., .,	cumstances.
7.—Γλωττη -	- Defe	end, by the foreign fense of the word.
8.—Μεταφορα	.	- by Metaphor.
9.—κατα Προσωδίαν		2
10.—Διαιρεσει		- by Punstuation.
ΙΙΑμφιβολια		- by Ambiguity.
12.— κατα το έθ 🗞 της λεξεως 🕒		- by Customary speech.
13.—Ποσαχως ἀν σημηνειε—οτ, of a word.
[14.—Γλαυκων& λυσις] -		- [Glauco's answer.]
[15.—ἐιχ©٠, και παρα το ἐικΦ٠ γιι		~
	fhoi	ald happen improbably.]
[16.—Ου το αυτο, η ε προς το αυτο, &c.] [The fame thing is not spoken of, or, not in the fame respect, &c.]

Here are, then, 16 different answers. Of these, it seems, upon the whole, most probable, that the 12 not enclosed in brackets, are the 12 which Aristotle means. My reason is, that in the beginning of the chapter, after laying down the three distinct considerations, of the different objects of imitation, the privileges of poctical language, and the distinction of essential and incidental faults, he immediately, and explicitly, refers to those three principles, as sources of all the answers. Ose dei ta entimpara—En TOYTON enimoneura AYEIN. Now it will be found, I believe, that the 12 answers above mentioned are drawn from those sources, and that the four remaining answers are not.

But why these four, which evidently are proposed as answers, and seem to be distinct answers, were not admitted in the concluding enumeration, it may not be easy to shew. Perhaps, Aristotle reckoned only as one solution, the two which he assigns to the same objection, with an i, or stweete near, &c. This would throw out No 14, and 15, which seem, indeed, to be mentioned only as a fort of secondary or subsidiary answers.—As to No 6, and 16, he might consider them as one; both of them, in fact, saying the same thing, and nearly in the same words—i. e. "circumstances must be considered." Still however, taking these together as one answer, that answer will be supernumerary; and how it is fairly to be got rid of, it is difficult to see: the more difficult, because it is the only hours furnished by the whole chapter to the objection of immoral tendency, ($\beta \lambda \alpha \beta \epsilon \rho \alpha$) upon which so great stress is laid.

All that feems tolerably clear is, that the 12 answers intended in the recapitulation are those 12, which are deducible from the three principles laid down at the opening of the chapter. In this idea, which I had formed before I consulted any commentator, I was glad to find myself supported by Goulston, in his accurate analysis; where he makes the 12 answers to be those here assigned, and draws them from the three sources at the beginning of the chapter: viz. three from the first source, (N° 3, 4, 5,)—seven from the fecond—the distion, (N° 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13,)—and two from the third source, (N° 1, and 2.)

N O T E 263.

P. 132. IF THAT WHICH IS THE LEAST VULGAR OR PO-.

—Ηττον ΦΟΡΤΙΚΗ. — The word φορτικον is used in a number of different, and sometimes nicely discriminated, senses, which cannot, all of them, be expressed by any single word in our language.

guage. Sometimes, for example, it is to be rendered by entravagant, violent, charged, outre', &c. as in the following pullage of Diog. Laertius about Bion:—ην δε και θεατρικώ, και πολυς εν τω γελοιώ διαφορησαι, ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΙΣ ονομασι κατα των πραγματων χρωμενώ,i. e. extravagant, exaggerated, outrés, as Bayle has well explained it, art. Bion, note [B], where he gives an inftance of this extravagance of expression in that philosopher, from Plutarch, who calls it ΦΟΡΤΙΚΩΤΕΡΟΝ°.

Sometimes, applied to perfons, it means troublefome, tirefome, &c. as in Ælian—πολυς ην λαλων, και έδοκει ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΣ. Var. Hijt. XII. 13.—Sometimes, infolent, overbearing, &c. as, in the fame writer, it is faid of a famous courtefan,— Η δε ην ΥΠΕΡΗΦΑΝΟΣ και δενως ΦΟΡΤΙΚΗ. XII. 63 .—Sometimes, again, and that very frequently, it is used as fynonymous with ἀνελευθες, βαναυσω, popular, low, vulgar, &c. as opposed to what is liberal, refined, delicate, genteel, &c. Thus Plutarch—ἀνελευθες, κομιδη και ΦΟΡΤΙΚΑΣ—φαντασιας. p. 216, ed. H. S. And Plato—ὁ φιλοτιμω—την μεν ἀπο των χρηματων ήδονην ΦΟΡΤΙΚΗΝ τινα ήγειται—" The ambitious man looks "upon gain as a vulgar fort of pleasure," De Rep. IX. p. 254, ed. Mass.—Jul. Pollux describes a species of dance called Μοθων, as,

* The Latin writers use molestus in this sense; for whatever is violent, overdone, laboured, affected, &c. Thus Cicero, in the following elegant passage of his Brutus: "Volo enim, ut in scens, sic etiam in soro, non eos modò laudari, qui coleri motu & dissili utantur, sed eos etiam quos statarios appellant, quoram sit illa simplex, ia agendo, veritas, non molesta. i. e. un postuen. cap. xxx. Again—"Latinè lou quendi accurata, et sine molestia diligens, elegantia: i. e. without lasour or affected grin; cap. xxxviii.—Catullus, too, of an affected grin;

— — illa, quam videtis Turpe incedere, mimicè ac MOLESTE Ridentem, catuli ore Gallicani.

b IV. 52.

Egwin. p. 1371. ed. H. St. See also the Timen of Lucian, ed. Den. p. 59.—in σει ΦΟΡΤΙΚΩΣ διαλεγωμαι—i. e. (as the context shews,) with the extracognine of Tragic rant.

[•] Υπεροπτικ Φ, ύπερφρων, βαρυς, ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΣ, έπαχ ένα. Jul. Pell. VI. 5.

ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΝ δοχημα και ναυτικον—" a vulgar and failor-like dance;" the bornpipe, I suppose, of the Greeks. And thus Athenaus, where he mentions, from Herodotus, the curious story of Agarifia. (the daughter of Clifthenes, king of Sievon,) and her fuitors, favs, that Clifthenes rejected Hippoclides, idw----ΦΟΡΤΙΚΩΣ ορχησαμενον: because he did not dance like a gentleman': a charge, which, according to Herodotus, scems indeed to have been pretty well founded; for he tells us, that Hippoclides got upon a table and danced upon his head 8.—But let us return to Aristotle. This last tense of the word popular appears to me clearly to be that, in which it is here used by him. I cannot think, that by popting, he intended to express, as Dacier, and the commentators before him, explain it, the trouble and expence of theatrical exhibition the number of things wanted-actors, scenes, dresses, music, &ch. Of all the commentators I have feen, M. Batteux alone gives, in a thort note, what I think the true meaning of the word in this place:—" ФортисЭ, groffier, digne des mercenaires. Aristote, Po-"litic. VIII. c. 6. oppose le spectateur mercenaire & ignorant, " φοστικώ, au spectateur honnête; & le plaisir grossier, ήδουη φορτικη, " les danses grossières, κωητεις φορτικωτερας, au plaisir delicat, aux " danses honnêtes."

Aristotle himself will here be his best commentator, in the pasfages to which M. Batteux refers.

Some forts of rhythm, he fays, $\Phi OPTIK\Omega TEPA\Sigma$ executas kungers, (violent and vulgar,) & de, EAEY $\Theta EPI\Omega TEPA\Sigma^{\perp}$. Again, in the f P. 628.

[·] And fee Suidas, v. Molwy.

Ε — Των κεφαίνεν έρειτας έπε των τραπεζών, τοις ΣΧΕΛΕΣΙ ΕΧΕΙΡΟΝΟΜΗΣΕ. Herol. VI. p. 238. et. II. St.

h—" htter pogram—i. e. quar paulin ibus eget adjumentis entrinfecus fumpti.," &c. Reborteili.—" Men grampa," in the fame fente, Caplelvetro.—" Manco carea & manco "I fografa Valuts." P'(est.—Beni follows Robortelli. Theorius renders—" importe t. a et i al., "a," hut enters into no particular explanation. Ducier—" la moins "e aurebe, & ce e qui aemande le moins d'aide & de fecurs."

^{*} D. Pr. VIII. 5 P. 455, II.

next chapter, relative to the mufical education of youth, he speaks of the pleasure of a popular musical audience, as a sulgar, illiberal fort of pleasure. "The performer there," he says, "aims only "at the pleasure of the hearers, και ταυτης ΦΟΡΤΗΣΗΣ δίσπερ δ ΤΩΝ ΕΛΕΥΘΕΡΩΝ κρινομέν είναι την εργασίαν, ("fuch performance "does not become a gentleman, ") αλλα ΘΑΤΙΚΩΤΕΡΑΝ (the playing of a man who is paid for playing:) και ΒΑΝΑΥΣΟΥΣ δη (mechanics) συμβαινεί γιγνεσθαι πουηρω γιαρ δ σιστών προς δι ποιεντα. το τέλων δ γαιρ ΘΕΑΤΗΣ, ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΣ ἀν, μεταβαλλείν είωθε την μεσσιαν—. Ibid. p. 457, 8.—In the next chapter is the following paifage, still more directly to our present purpose, in which he expressly distinguishes, as here, the two forts of spectators, or hearers:—θεατης δίστων, δ μεν ΕΛΕΥΘΕΡΟΣ και ΠΕΠΑΙΛΕΥΜΕΝΟΣ, δ δε ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΣ, ἐκ βαναυσών, και θητών, και άλλων τοιετών, συγπερμένων. p. 459, Α¹.

The word occurs frequently in other parts of Aristotle's writings, and seems generally, if not always, to be used in the same sense.

By φορτικη, then, applied to Tragedy, I think it clear, that he means only—calculated for φορτικοι spectators; adapted to the entertainment of popular audiences—to the taste, as we commonly k In discussing, however, the question, whether boys should learn Music practically, and play or sing themselves, Aristotle determines, that they fould, and gives this reason, that "it is a thing impossible, or, at least, very dissipute, for those, who do not actually practife an art, to be good judges of it." p. 456.—It might be so in those days. Modern connoisseurs, both in Music and Painting, find no such difficulty.

¹ So Plutarch, in the beginning of his Comparifon of Arighophanes and Menander, p. 1567, ed. H. S.—Το ΦΟΡΤΙΚΟΝ, φησιν, έν κογοις, και δυμεκικον, και ΒΑΝΑΥΣΟΝ, άς έτιν Αςιστοσακει, Μενανδρο δε έδλειως. Και γαρ, δ μεν ΑΠΑΙΔΕΥΤΌΣ και ΙΔΙΩΤΗΣ έις εκειν© κεγει άλισκεται, δ δε πεπαιδευμεν© δυσχεραινει.

The Ethic. Nicom. IV. 8. - βωμολοχοι—και φοςτικοι. And I. 5, where he fays, that, OI ΠΟΛΛΟΙ και ΦΟΡΤΙΚΩΤΑΤΟΙ, held the fumerum bonum to be pleafure. See also Rhet. III. 1. p. 584, A.

[&]quot; Mr. Pope, probably without thinking of Aristotle, has almost translated him, where, in his preface to Shakspeare, he says—" It must be ellowed, that stage-poetry, of all others, is more particularly levelled to please the populace."

express it, of the upper gallery, as opposed to the refined and cultivated taske of men of reading and reflection.

As far as I can judge, from a comparison of the different senses of the word with its etymology, the common idea, which runs through and connects them all, is that of excess, or, perhaps, more exactly, of offensive, disgusting, or burdensome, by excess, of some kind or other.

N O T E 264.

P. 132. As if the audience, without the AID of ACTION, &c.—

΄Ως γαρ εκ αισθανομενων, αν μη ΑΥΤΟΣ ΠΡΟΣΘΗι, πολλην κινησιν κινεν-This wound has been fufficiently probed. When I found, that the "medica manus" of Mr. Toup had been tried upon it, I looked, at least, for the "falubres Ambrosiæ succos, et odoriferam " panaceam"," if not for the precious Dictamnus, that would entirely heal it. He proposed to read—ων μη ΑΥΛΟΣ ΠΡΟΣΗι^b. I should be very forry to do any injustice to the emendation of fo masterly a Greek scholar; but I am obliged to confess, that I do not understand it. "The imitators have recourse to every kind of "motion, just as if the audience were not able to understand (or, "to hear) them, without the addition or accompaniment of a flute." How any sense can be made of this, or of any other fair version of the paffage, fo corrected, I cannot discover. The emendation, furely, requires to be explained, at least; and if Mr. Toup gave any explanation in his letter to Mr. Winstanley, it is to be wished, that the learned editor had communicated it to the public in his note.

[·] From ΦΟΡΤΟΣ—onus,

^a Æn. XII. 411.

b See Mr. Winstanley's note, p. 309 of his edition.

It is some comfort, however, that the general meaning of the passage seems liable to little or no difficulty; and, accordingly, in that, all the commentators, I think, are agreed, however widely; they may differ as to the reading.

N O T E 265.

P. 132. LIKE BAD FLUTE-PLAYERS, WHO WHIRL THEM-SELVES ROUND, WHEN THEY WOULD IMITATE THE MOTION OF THE DISCUS—.

This is one of those antique curiosities, which we stare at, without knowing very well what to make of it.—'Av ΔΙΣΚΟΝ δεη μιμεισθαι. We should think it very strange, if we were told of a stute-player baving occasion to imitate a quoit. But we are not to understand this of a mere instrumental solo, but of a performer accompanying words sung by a Chorus, (as appears from the mention of the Coryphaus,) and endeavouring, in an absurd manner, to express them. The antient Audities, or Tibicen, was not, it seems, a mere sedentary performer, like those of a modern orchestra. He accompanied the Chorus with his person, as well as with his instrument, and seems to have paraded about the stage, in a pompous dress; to have made a part of the Opies, or shew, and to have joined in all the turns, and returns, and various evolutions, of the choral dance. Hence the description of Horace:

Sie prise motumque et luxuriam addidit arti Tibicen, traxitque vagus per pulpita vestem. A. P. 214-

Lucian, in his Harmonides, describing the requisites of a good Auλητης, mentions, among the rest,—και BAINEIN ἐν ρυθμω. —The great masters, no doubt, respected themselves, and confined their motion to the dignity of a fort of rhythmic strut. But Aristotle, ² P. 638, cd. Een.

here, is describing the tricks of the $\varphi \alpha \nu \lambda \sigma i$ or $\varphi \sigma \varphi \tau i \nu \sigma i$ performers. Such a performer might have occasion, or rather take occasion, to imitate the whirling or rolling of a disc, if the subject, for example, of the choral song chanced to be the story of Apollo and Hyacinthus; which is mentioned by Lucian in a long list of sabulous subjects, enumerated as a part of the knowledge requisite to an accomplished pantomimic dancer b. Or, the subject might be taken from Homer, Od. 6. 186, &c.

Kυλιομενοι. Dacier, in his note, translates this, "rolling them"felves upon the ground." This would be φοςτικον indeed. Yet in this idea he follows Victorius; who enters into a discussion, of some length, to prove that κυλιομενοι can mean nothing but rolling on the ground. Nor will he allow the difficulty of doing this while they were playing to be a sufficient objection. Certainly, the usual and proper sense of the word is on his side. But it was natural enough, surely, to apply to the motion imitating, the term proper to the motion imitated.

De Salt. p. 933. ed. Ben.—A modern dancer—perhaps even M. Vestris himself—would stare at the account which Lucian gives in that treatife, of the accomplishments necessary to make a persest dancer. "He must not only understand music, but poetry, geometry, and above all, philosophy, natural and moral; rhetoric, painting, sculpture; especially, he must have an excellent memory, and have all history at his singers ends, from the creation of the world down to Cleopatra," &c. Logic, indeed, Lucian confesses, is not absolutely necessary. But so great, he says, must be his knowledge, that, "like Homer's Chalcas, he must know—

·· - τα τ' όντα, τα τ' ἐσσομενα, προ τ' ἐοντα!''

All this Lucian professes to prove; but, as might well be expected, some of his affertions are very lamely made out, others sturred over, or entirely neglected. The treatife, however, is, upon the whole, a curious piece; and, though far from sufficient to give a clear and complete idea of the pantomimic dance of the antients, yet affords more information about it, than is to be found, I believe, any where che.

N O T E 266.

P. 132. AND PULL THE CORYPHÆUS WHEN SCYLLA IS THE SUBJECT.

Έλκοντες τον Κορυφαιον.—To imitate Scylla,—" naves in faxa tra-" bentem," as Virgil has expressed it. But it is not easy to see, how the performer, at least while he was playing, could well spare a hand for this operation.—This was even worse than what we call humouring a catch; when, for instance, a singer who is performing Purcell's "Fie, nay prithee, John"—thinks it necessary to collar his neighbour.

N O T E 267.

P. 133. THE TRAGIC IMITATION, WHEN ENTIRE ---

'H' OΛΗ τεχνη. Heinfius proposed, ή ΑΛΛΗ τεχνη. But I believe the established reading to be right. The whole art—i. e. Tragedy, as represented; with all its constituent parts, and, as it was said before, ἀπαντα μιμεμενη. For it might, as Aristotle presently observes, be read, or recited, like an Epic Poem; and, in that view, the comparison here made would not hold.

Τεχνη—i. e. the Tragic art: for so he uses the word, cap. i. not for the whole Poetic art, but for a single branch of it:—eν τωις ειρημενωις ΤΕΧΝΑΙΣ—i. e. Epic Poetry, Tragedy, Comedy, &c. So too at the end of that chapter: τως διαφορώς ΤΩΝ ΤΕΧΝΩΝ. And, again, at the end of this chapter, (as I understand the passage,) της ΤΕΧΝΗΣ έργω. See NOTE 277.

* Æn. III. 425.

NOTE 268.

P. 133. TO HEARERS OF THE BETTER SORT ---

—Θεατας επιεκες: to which he opposes φαυλες. The word επιεικεις seems rightly explained here by Dacier—" les honnêtes gens; " c'est à dire, les gens qui ont eu une meilleure education." The passage, which he quotes from Plato, is much to the purpose of this chapter. Συγχωρω δη τογε τοσετου και έγω τοις πολλοις, δειν την, μεσικην ήδουη κρινεσθαι μη μεντοι των επιτυχουτων άλλα σχεδου εκεινην είναι μεσαν καλλιςτι, ήτις ΤΟΥΣ ΒΕΛΤΙΣΤΟΥΣ, και ΙΚΑΝΩΣ ΠΕΠΑΙ-ΔΕΥΜΕΝΟΥΣ τερπει.—De Leg. II. p. 658.

Aristotle uses επιείκης in the same sense, Eth. Nicom. IV. 8, p. 186, ed. Wilk.—τοιαυτα λεγείν και άκεειν, δια τφ ΕΠΙΕΙΚΕΙ ΚΑΙ ΕΛΕΥΘΕΡΩι άρμοττει.

N O T E 269.

P. 133. And in singing—.

και διαδοντα. There feems great reason to suspect this word. For, what is the force of the preposition here? Some commentators, without disputing the reading, neglect the preposition entirely, and render the word as if it were the simple participle, αδοντα. Others understand, singing throughout: "qui continenter canit." Goulst. But the proper sense of διαδείν, would, I think, be—to sing dissonantly—to sing out of tune,—as, ΔΙΑφωνείν. And so the word is actually used in the treatise Hegi κοσμε, in Aristotle's works, and opposed to ΣΥΝάδον, as ΔΙΑφωνείν is to ΣΥΜφωνείν:—συμφερομενον, και διαφερομενον συνάδον, και ΔΙΑίΔΟΝ². "The agree"ing, and the disagreeing, the consonant, and the dissonant." But as the word cannot here be admitted, in that which appears to be its only proper and warrantable sense, I suspect, it might, originally, have been only adout a. Considering how frequently Δ and A were consounded by transcribers, KAI AIDONTA might easily be blundered into KAI DIAIDONTA. One MS. reading is $\delta \omega \Delta I$ -dout a; where the ΔI , plainly enough, arose from the AI.

The commentators understand from this passage, that there were two sorts of rhapsodists; one, of those who recited Epic Poetry, and another, of those who fung it. Whether this can be proved from other passages of antient authors, I know not. From this, it certainly cannot. Aristotle says, KAI ξαψωδεντα—ΚΑΙ διαδεντα . Whatever the διαδων was, he is here clearly distinguished from the ξαψωδων—the rhapsodist.

That the rhapfodists did not, in the strict and musical sense, at least, of the word, sing the verses of Homer, but recited or declaimed them only, we may pretty safely inser, from what is expressly said of Epic Poetry at the beginning of this work—that "it imitates by words only," without melody and rhythm—i. e. without music. This, indeed, will not prove that Epic Poetry was never sung, any more than what was said of Tragedy—that it imitates by words and music—will prove that it was never recited, or read. Yet the least, I think, that can be inferred from it, is, that Epic Poetry was, in general, and for the most part, recited or declaimed only; and, consequently, that the rhapfodists, properly so called, being the established performers of Epic Poetry, as the b Harris, Philof. Arrang. p. 47.

This passage is much mistaken by M. Batteux, who renders it, "Qu'on peut "faire des gestes en recitant l'Epopée,----qu'on peut même chanter," &c. Faire des gestes, comes sar short of ΠΕΡΙΕΡΓΑΖΕΣΘΑΙ σημειοις. The και which precedes the participle, ραφρόδυτα, is omitted: and to produce his sense of διαδουτα—qu'on peut même chanter, the Greek should be—isi περιεργαζεσθαι---και διαΔΕΙΝ.

actors were of Tragic, performed it always in that manner: without finging, any farther, than as the tones of loud and fuftained declamation approach more nearly to finging than those of common reading. The earliest Lyric Poet-Musicians, indeed, as we learn from Plutarch and Athenæus, used to fing even the hexameters of Homer and Hefold, as well as their own, to the lyre. But they, plainly, speak of this, as of an antient practice: -- Tov Τερπανδρον, ΚΙΘΑΡΩΔΙΚΩΝ πειητην οντα νομων, [hymns,] κατα νομον έκαςον, ΤΟΙΣ ΕΠΕΣΙ, τοις έαυτε, και ΤΟΙΣ ΌΜΗΡΟΥ, ΜΕΛΗ περιτιθεντα, ΑιΔΕΙΝ εν τοις άγωσω. Plut. Dial. de Muf. p. 2074, ed. H. St. And afterwards—ότι δε δι κιθαρωδικοι νομοι, 'ΟΙ ΠΑΛΑΙ, έξ ΕΠΩΝ συνις αντο, Τιμοθε 🕲 έδηλωσε, έτς. p 2075. So, too, Athenæus:-" Chamæleon, in his book about Stefichorus, και μελωδηθηναι φησι, έ μονον τα Όμησε, άλλα και Ήσιοδε, και Αρχιλοχε, &c. ΚΑΙ μελωδηθηναι -" were even fung." p. 620.

It is not, however, at all improbable, that Homer might be fometimes fung, in Aristotle's time, and that this Mnasitheus, (of whom nothing is known,) might be a performer in this way. But, that this was a diffinct thing from payadia feems pretty clear.

N O T E 270.

P. 133. Whose Gestures resemble those of immo-DEST WOMEN.

The passage of Aulus Gellius, to which I referred in my note on the translation, as a story, both curious in itself, and confirming what was there advanced, is this. "Histrio in terrâ Græciâ fuit " famà celebri: qui, gestûs et vocis claritudine & venustate, cæteris "antestabat. Nomen fuisse aiunt Polum. Tragædias poetarum " nobilium scitè atque asseverate actitavit. Is Polus unice amatum

⁴ Paclusco, and δποκριται, are continually joined together, See Plato, in that entertaining dialogue, the 10, tom. I. p. 532, D. 535, E. and in a great many other planes. 6

"filium morte amisit. Eum luctum quum satis visus est eluxisse, "rediit ad quæstum artis. In eo tempore Athenis Electram Sophoclis acturus, gestare urnam quasi cum Orestis ossibus debebat.

Ita compositum fabulæ argumentum est, ut, veluti fratris reliquias ferens Electra, comploret commisereturque interitum ejus, qui per vim exstinctus existimatur. Igitur Polus, lugubri habitu Electræ indutus, ossa atque urnam à sepulchro tulit silii; &, quasi Orestis amplexus, opplevit omnia, non simulachris neque imitamentis, sed luctu atque lamentis veris & spirantibus.

Itaque, quum agi fabula videretur, dolor actitatus est." A. Gell. VII. 5.

N O T E 271.

P. 134. THE MUSIC AND THE DECORATION, BY THE LATTER OF WHICH THE ILLUSION IS HEIGHTENED, &c.

The Greek, here, in either of the two readings warranted by manuscript authority, is unsatisfactory and suspicious, and the sense, consequently, uncertain. The reading of the old editions is—δι ής τας ήδονας ἐπιςανται ἐναργεςατα: which Victorius renders— "per quam voluptates percipiunt evidentissimè:"—"through, or by "means of, which, they perceive the pleasures most evidently." Nothing can well be more harsh, or strange.—ἐπιςανται—they perceive:—IVho?—The spectators. To this mode of speaking, however, I should not object; because this ellipsis, of δι ἀνθρωποι, is frequent in both the Greek and Latin writers. Thus, in the beginning of this chapter, κινενται. This answers to that very convenient idiom, of which the French make so much use, and which we so often find the want of—on s'agite—on apperçoit, &c.".

But,

^{*} See Sand. Minerv. IV. 4, and Periz. note 39.

b According to Menage, the Fr. on, is only a corruption of homme; and on dit, for example, was antiently written, "happen dit." And thus the Italian writers use

But, the verb, emisaurai, will, I apprehend, by no means bear the fense here forced upon it, of perceiving pleasure; or any sense, but that of understanding, or knowing. Were I, therefore, obliged to make fome fense of this reading, it would be this:- " per quant " [zuæ efficientur] voluptates, nôrunt homines apertissimè:" "the pleafures, which are produced through which, are clearly " undersissad—well known to all. But this, I confess, is violent interpretation; and, in particular, I doubt whether the word evapores is ever used, by Aristotle at least, as merely synonymous to φανερου; as evident to reason or understanding, and opposed to doubtful. always means, I believe, evident, clear, visible, to the eye of imagi-Thus, cap. xvii. - Δει δε τες μυθες συνις αναι μαλισα ΠΡΟ ΟΜΜΑΤΩΝ τιθεμενον' έτω γαρ αν ΕΝΑΡΓΕΣΤΑΤΑ ΌΡΩΝ, ώσπες ΠΑΡ' ΑΥΤΟΙΣ ΓΙΓΝΟΜΕΝΟΣ ΤΟΙΣ ΠΡΑΤΤΟΜΕ-These words seem to furnish the best comment upon MOIE, &c. the passage in question, and will perhaps lead us to the most reafonable and least exceptionable interpretation of it; for perfect fatisfaction is not, I think, to be expected, in the prefent condition of the text. We ought, furely, at all events, to adhere to the proper and clear meaning of the adverb εναργεςατα, as used in the passage just cited; where the word itself, and the explanatory expreffions which accompany it, afford a pretty strong prefumption. that Aristotle, here, meant to express the particular advantage which Tragedy receives from the Obis, or, from actual representation*, nom. Thus—" quando nom se n'accorge." Tasso's Éminta.—" Uom dice." Petrarch, Son. 190, &c. And thus the Germans use the word man: man saght—men say—they say, &c.—See Menage's Offervaz. sopra l'Iminta.

Fiel. himfelf admits this objection: "Verbum hoe (ἐπισανται) infolens videtur in hoe fignificatu."

^{*} So the passage was understood by the editor of the Ox. ed. without accents, 1760, who refers di his to the dis, and proposes this emendation: di his, (scil. dieus) THE TIDONIE GOUSTAVIA TA EVAPTESATA—" per quam, voluptatis pars evidentissima e esticitur; quippe quae oculis subjecta est sidelibus." But I cannot think that Aristotle would have written, di HE, THE hours—.

as giving to the imitation the greatest possible reality of effect, and producing the most perfect illusion in the spectator. Yet this, it must be owned, is very obscurely expressed, if it be expressed, by the Greek; which, according to the best reading, that of Victorius, and of many MSS d. will stand thus: και έτι, ε μικρον μερ@s την μεσικήν και την δίψιν έχει, δί ής ΑΙ ΉΔΟΝΑΙ ΣΥΝΙΣΤΑΝΤΑΙ έναργεςατα: that is, according to the only fense which I can find for it-"and the decoration, or spectacle; by means of which, the plea-"fures we receive from Tragedy", are rendered more fenfible, "ftriking, illufive," &c. But many objections may, undoubtedly, be made. For the fair and literal version would be this: "by " means of which, the pleasures are formed, composed, constructed, or " constituted", in the clearest and most visible manner." I give, here, what I apprehend to be the only fair fense of the verb, our-15ασθαι; but it feems to be, by no means, the proper word in this place, and probably is not the word which Ariftotle wrote. If any one MS. would offer me HAP15avta:, I would readily accept it. Ælian, describing the effect of a trumpet, sounding suddenly, at the instant when a famous painting was exhibited, of a warrior in the act of rushing to the battle, says—aua TE en TO MEAD MUZETO τραχυ και φοβερου-και έδεικνυτο ή γραφη, και ό ερατιωτης έβλεπετο, τε μελες ΕΝΑΡΓΕΣΤΕΡΑΝ την φαντασιαν τε εκβοηθεντο ετι και μαλλεν ΠΑΡΑΣΤΗΣΑΝΤΟΣ: i. e. " prefenting to the imagination a still " more lively and striking image"." But again—άι ήδουαι, is not d See Mr. Winstanley's edition.

[&]quot;It is, certainly, most natural to understand the pleasures of the music and decoration to be here spoken of. And so it is generally understood. But I cannot see how the words will admit that sense: for the Greek does not say—" by which the most sense sible and striking pleasures are preduced;" but, " by which the playares (i. c. some the pleasures,) are produced in the most sensible and striking a ay"—hagyiera. To express the other sense, Aristotle would probably have written, increasure indicate.

f Vict.—conflantur—congmentantur. And, indeed, in this fense, and no other, is the verb συντασθαι used throughout the treatife.

⁵ Var. Hijt. II. 44.

what one would expect here. To speak, indeed, of terror and pity, as the pleasures of Tragedy, is persectly agreeable, both to the doctrine, and to the language, of the author, throughout. But, it is not, properly, the pleasure—it is not the terror, or the pity—that is rendered more evagyes; but that pleasure is heightened by the action being rendered so.

Upon the whole, however, I fee no other meaning that can be obtained from the words, without still greater violence and improbability of interpretation. Dacier, Batteux, and Goulston, make the affertion— a hora, &cc. relate to both music and decoration. But it is, furely, quite unwarrantable to give to— δ , 'H Σ , the fenfe of, δ. 'ΩN, or δ.' 'AIN. Besides that the music, however great the pleasure it may afford, cannot, I think, properly be considered as contributing to the evappeaa, or as heightening the illusion, of Tra-Victorius, who read—την μεσικήν και ΤΑΣ 'ΟΨΕΙΣ, very confistently made is refer to meomy only: and Castelvetro very properly observes, that, " if we read— THY offen—le predette parole " [i. e. δί ής αι ήδοναι, κ. τ. αλ.] havranno rispetto alla vista; & " conteneranno la commendatione della detta vista, per la quale si " constituisca il diletto più manifestamente-che non si fa per le parole " dell' epopea." p. 690. He appears, I think, to have understood the paffage in the way I have proposed. But he mentions another reading, which I have not feen noticed anywhere elfe—ενΕργεςαταί. This had occurred to me, formerly, as a conjecture, before I had feen Castelvetro's commentary. But it gives much the same sense, and would remove no difficulty with respect to the passage itself; though, as I shall prefently have occasion to observe, it might suit better with what follows.

h Sec Note 277.

i « Alcuni testi leggono іледувгата."

N O T E 272.

P. 134. IT HAS THE ADVANTAGE OF GREATER CLEAR-NESS—AS WELL IN READING, AS IN REPRESENTATION.

Eita, και το ἐναργες ἐχει, και ἐν τη ἀναγνωσει, και ἐντι των ἐργων.—

It feems rather strange, that, immediately after mentioning the ἐναργες of the 'Οψις, Aristotle should say—" Then, it has also the "ἐναργες," &c. It was this which induced me to suspect, that for ἐναργεςατα, in the preceding passage, we should read—ἐνΕργεςατα:
" By means of which, [i. c. of the ἀψις,] the pleasures we receive "from Tragedy (those, of terror and pity excited by imitation, as he "says cap. xiv".] are rendered more forcible and efficacious." But the objection is, perhaps, not of sufficient force to warrant a departure from the established reading of all the manuscripts, ἐναργεςατα: and we may, well enough, understand the author, as if he had said—" Then, farther, another advantage is, that Tragedy "has this ἐναργες, not only on the slage, and on account of the "'Οψις, but even in reading also."

That arayrwoei is right, (not arayrweisei,) I cannot entertain a doubt. Nothing can be more evidently nonfensical than this distinction—"both in the discoveries, and in the incidents;" as if a discovery were not an incident.

The expression, ἐπι των ἐργων, for, in representation, acting, parformance, &c. seems liable to no difficulty. Thus, De Rep. VIII. p. 455, δηλων ἐκ των ΕΡΓΩΝ—from what happens in the performance of such music. And see ibid. cap. vi. throughout which, ἐργα is repeatedly used for musical performance; particularly, p. 457,—τα θαυμασια και περιττα ΤΩΝ ΕΡΓΩΝ, "furprising and elaborate performance."

Την άπο έλιες και φοβε δία μιμησεως 'ΗΔΟΝΗΝ.

b See Diff. II. p. 53.

N O T E 273.

P. 134. ATTAINING THE END OF ITS IMITATION IN A SHORTER COMPASS.

Dryden fays of this passage—" It is one reason of Aristotle's, "to prove that Tragedy is the more noble, because it turns in a "shorter compass; the whole action being circumscribed within the space of sour and twenty hours. He might prove as well, that a mushroom is to be preferred before a peach, because it shoots up in the compass of a night." &c.

If Aristotle had said, that Tragedy was the more noble, because a Poet could compose a Tragedy in much less time than an Epic Poem, the simile would have been justly applied. Dryden had, but just before, said, that "the effects of Tragedy are too violent" to be lasting." But he did not give himself time to see, that Tragedy owes this greater violence of effect to the shortness of its plan; that is, to its stricter unity, its more concentrated and unbroken interest, its "close accelerated plot";" to that absorption, as Aristotle calls it, so essential to the purpose of Tragedy, which is, to give the pleasure of strong emotion. The Epic Poem is of too tedious a length, too various and episodic, to produce that effect in the same degree as Tragedy, which is read, or seen, at once, and without interruption.

But the case was, that Dryden, (who, as I have before had occasion to remark, appears to have taken his idea of Aristotle from French translation,) wrote this in the preface to his translation of an Epic Poeme; on the contrary, when he was writing on Tragedy, he gave Tragedy the preference.

² Dr. Hurd's Disc. on Poet. Imit. p. 1403

[?] P. 187, note (d).

N O T E 274.

P. 134. HIS POEM, IF PROPORTIONABLY CONTRACTED, WILL APPEAR CURTAILED.

—Μυσρον.—Nothing is more diverting than the explanation which fome commentators give of this word, and its application here. The Poem, it feems, is compared to the tail of a mouse, or a rat, which grows less and less towards the end:—" versus extremum attenuata"." I never heard, that any naturalists have observed this property to be peculiar to the tails of rats and mice. The fact seems to be, that the words μυσρον, and μεισρον, however their etymologies may appear to differ, have both the same meaning—that of cropped, curtailed, tronqué, as M. Batteux translates it. Μεισρω ςιχω, i. e. ὁ κατα το τελω έλλειπων χρονω. [Hephast. p. 92, ed. De Pauw.]—Το which is opposed, δολιχουρω—a long-tailed verse: ὁ κατα το τελω πλεοναζων συλλαβη.

In the Rhetoric, Aristotle applies μεικοω to a period that is too short, and disappoints the ear by ending abruptly. The passage is curious for its expression, and illustrates both the word itself, and its application, here, to a Poem, which disappoints the expectation of a reader in the same manner, by ending before its time. Δει δε, και τα κωλα, και τας περιοδες, μητε ΜΕΙΟΥΡΟΥΣ έιναι, μητε ΜΑΚΡΑΣ το μεν γας ΜΙΚΡΟΝ [i. e. μεικρον] προσπταιών πολλακις ποιες

÷. -

[·] Preface to the Eneid.

[&]quot; Though Tragedy be justly preferred above the other"-i. e. the Epic Poem, Essay on Dram. Poely.

² So Robortelli, Victorius, Goulston.—" Appaia una coda di toto." Casteloctre.— ⁴⁶ Venga ella à far' apparentia di coda di forcie, col fuo fine angusto." Piccol.

τον ακροατην αναγκη γας, όταν, έτι δρμων έπι το πορρω, και το μετρον έ έχει έν έαυτω όρε, ΑΝΤΙΣΠΑΣΘΗι παυσαμένε, ΌΙΟΝ, ΠΡΟΣΠΤΑΙΕΙΝ γιγνεσθαι, δια την ΑΝΤΙΚΡΟΥΣΙΝ. Rhet. III. 9, p. 592, ed. Duval.

N O T E 275.

P. 134. IF EXTENDED TO THE USUAL LENGTH-

Ακελεθεντα τω τε μετος μημει..... Almost all the commentators and translators understand—answerable to the length of the metre. And this is, certainly, the most obvious and unforced sense of the words: for, had Aristotle meant, by μετρού, the standard measure, or length, of the Poem, as other commentators understand it; he, probably, would have rather faid—τω τε ΜΗΚΟΥΣ ΜΕΤΡΩι^a. Metreco is so used in the passage given in the last note: 70 METPON έ έχει εν έαυτω όρε. If, however, metre be the fense, (for, after all, the passage is ambiguous,) the expression must, I think, be underflood as a short way of faving-" conformable to the usual length " of Poems in that metre"—of Poems in heroic verse. See what is faid, cap. xxiv. about the adaptation of the hexameter to Epic Poetry: εδεις MAKPAN συς ασιν εν άλλω πεποιηκεν ή τω ήρωω.—Ι cannot conceive that Aristotle meant to fay, that the length of the Epic Poem was proportioned, or ought to be proportioned, to the length of the metre. Yet so the commentators. "Si-Poeta secutus " fuerit longitudinem, quæ instar videtur ejus carminis." Vict .-" Si cum metri Imgitudine provehatur." Goulft. &c. It was not the length of the hexameter which made it the fittest measure for heroic Poetry, but the nature of the feet of which it is composed; and on that account it was preferred, as ξασιμωτατον και δγκωδεςατον των μετρων. cap. xxiv. The length of a verse is to be measured by the times (xerror) which compose it. Now the hexameter is but one third longer than the lambic trimeter; their respective times being 24, and 18: so that the length of an Epic Poem would be strictly proportioned to the length of its verse— $\tau \varphi$ $\tau \varepsilon$ $\mu \varepsilon \tau \varphi \varepsilon$ $\mu \kappa \tau \varphi \varepsilon$ were it longer by one third only than a Tragedy.

^a As, $\mu n \kappa u s i_{\delta} \odot$, $\epsilon a p$, x x i v, and $\epsilon a p$, v i i.

N O T E 276.

P. 134. DILUTED.

'Υδαςη—watery. Aristotle uses the same metaphor in the following passage of his second book De Republica, where, opposing the community of wives and children proposed by Plato*, he very justly objects, that it would weaken the bond of social union, by diluting the social affections, and destroying—Relations dear, and all the charities Of father, fon, and brother——.

Par. Loft, IV. 756.

—Εν δε τη πολεί, την ΦΙΛΙΑΝ ἀναγκαίον ΥΔΑΡΗ γινεσθαί, δια την κοίνωνίαν την τοιαυτήν, και ήκιςα λεγείν τον έμον, ή ύιον, πατερα, ή πατερα, ύιον. Ωσπερ γαρ μικρον γλυκυ, εις πολυ ύδωρ μιχθεν, ἀναισθητον ποιεί την κρασιν, έτω συμβαίνει και την δικειοτήτα, την προς άλληλες, την ἀπο των δνοματών τυτών—κ. τ. λ. Ι flop there, because the passage is evidently desective, though the sense is plain.

a Rip. V.

b He alludes here to Plato's expressions, who contended, on the contrary, that the bond of social unity must be the closer, where all the citizens—αμα φθεγγωνται——τα τοιαδε βηματο, το τε ΕΜΟΝ, παι το 'ΟΥΚ ΕΜΟΝ. p. 356, ed. Mass.

N O T E 277.

P. 135. AND, ALSO, IN THE PECULIAR END AT WHICH IT

Και, ετι, τω της τεχνης έργω. The expression is ambiguous. may mean, either the end, or business, of the Poetic art in general, or, that of Tragedy-of the Tragic art a. The latter, however, frems, pretty clearly, to be the meaning: for his expression—TETOIS τε διαφερει πασ:, ΚΑΙ ΕΤΙ τω της τεχνης έργω—shews the author to be speaking, here, of a distinst advantage. But, if we understand it to mean, that Tragedy answers the end of Poetry better than the Epic, this cannot be confidered as an advantage distinct from those enumerated before, which are, plainly, fuch as contribute to the general end of Poetry—that of giving pleasure—of interesting, delighting, striking, &c. Whereas, if the peculiar end of Tragedy be superior to that of Epic Poetry, this, indeed, is an additional and feparate advantage. Befides, the parenthetical infertion which immediately follows—δει ΓΑΡ, ε την τυχεσαν ήδουην ποιειν αυτας (i. e. the Epic and Tragic Poems,) αλλα την εισημενην—plainly implies, that the Texyus Epyov, of which he had been speaking, was that of affording the particular pleasure proper to the species. And thus, too, the word έργον is used in other passages: τραγωδίας έργον, cap. vi. and cap. xiii.

The words, $\mu \alpha \lambda \lambda \delta \sigma \tau \varepsilon \tau \varepsilon \lambda \varepsilon \varepsilon \tau \sigma \gamma \gamma \gamma \alpha \sigma \varepsilon \sigma \alpha$, present a similar, but more embarrassing, ambiguity. Is $\tau \varepsilon \lambda \otimes$, here, the end of Poetry, or the end of Tragedy? If we take it in the latter sense, Aristotle will say, that Tragedy is superior, both because its end—the peculiar effect which it purposes to produce—is superior to that of the Epic Poem, and, because it attains that end more perfectly than the Epic attains its end. But this Aristotle has not proved, not does it appear to be true. On the other hand, if we understand reas to mean the end of the poetic art, it is obviously true, that, if Tragedy be superior in all those respects which he had mentioned—in its closer unity, its brevity, its evagyera, its music, and its decorations—and, besides, (now er) in the specific end at which it aims—it must, on the whole, be presented to the Epic Poem, as answering more effectually the end of Poetry, by giving greater pleasure.

^a Sec NOTE 267.

For, that this, in Aristotle's view, was the great end of the art, and of all its branches, appears, if I mistake not, evidently, from many other passages of this treatise, as well as from that now before us. Nor does he, any where, appear to me to give any countenance to an idea, which rational criticism has, now, pretty well exploded—that utility and instruction are the end of Poetry. That it may indeed be rendered, in some degree, useful and improving, sew will deny; none, that it ought to be made so, if it can. But, that the chief end and purpose of Poetry is to instruct—that Homer wrote his Iliad on purpose to teach mankind the mischiefs of discord among chiefs, and his Odyssey, to prove to them the advantages of staying at home and taking care of their samilies —this is so manifestly absurd, that one is really astonished to see so many writers, one after the other, discoursing gravely in defence of it.

It

b As it does in a fimilar expression, cap. xxv. which favours the same sense here: ε ε τυγχανοι τε τελες τε αυτης—i. e. of Poetry in general.

[&]quot; La verité qui fert de fond à cette hôtion, et qui avec elle compose la Fable, est, " Que l'absence d'une personne bors de chez soi, ou qui n'a point l'æil à ce qui s'y fait, y " cause de grands desordres."—And again—" Ces grands noms de Rois, de Heros, " d'Achille, d'Agamemnon, & d'Ulysse, ne designent pas moins les derniers Bour" geois," &c.—Du Poeme Ep. I. 10.

d Piccolomini, in particular, p. 369, &c. of his Annot. nella Poet. d'Arift. And the

It is true indeed, that Aristotle, in his account of Tragedy, mentions the correction and refinement of the passions, pity, terror, &c. as a useful effect of Tragic representations. But he no where, either in his definition, where we might furely have expected him to be explicit, or in any other part of his book, calls that effect the end of Tragedy. All his expressions prove, that his end, both of Tragic and of Epic Poetry, was pleasure; though, with respect to Tragedy, he afferts, (by way, as I have before fuggested, of obviating Plato's objections to ite,) that the pleasure arising from it was fo far from being pernicious, that it was even useful; fo far from inflaming the passions of men, that it tended, on the contrary, to purify and moderate them in common life. When the reader fees the expressions, to which I allude, laid together, he will hardly, I think, entertain any doubt upon this head.—τα μεγιςα, όις ΨΥΧΑΓΩΓΕΙ΄ ή Τραγωδια, μυθε μερη έςιν, &c. cap. vi. —ες. δε εχ άυτη άπο Τραγωδίας 'ΗΔΟΝΗ. cap. xiii.—ε γαρ πασαν δα ζητειν ΉΔΟΝΗΝ ἀπο Τραγωδίας, ἀλλα ΤΗΝ ΌΙΚΕΙΑΝ. Επει δε την απο έλευ και φοθυ, δια μιμησεως, δει ΉΔΟΝΗΝ παρασκευαζειν τον ποιητην cap. xiv.—ίν, ώσπες ζωον έν όλου, ποιη την ΟΙΚΕΙΑΝ ΉΔΟΝΗΝ. cap. XXIII. - την οψιν, δι ής AI HΔΟΝΑΙ, &c. cap. ult. - δει γαρ ε την τυχυσων ΉΔΟΝΗΝ ποιείν ΑΥΤΑΣ, άλλα την ειρημενην. ibid.

From all this it appears, I think, indubitably, that the great end of Poetry in general, was, in Aristotle's opinion, to give plea-the reader may see, if he has any stomach to see, the disgussing nonsense of Le Bossu upon this subject, ch. ii. iii. iv. &c. of his first book. By way of perfect contrast, he may then turn to the Differtation on the Idea of Universal Poetry, [Dr. Hurd's Hor. vol. ii.] See also Dr. Beattie's Essay on Poetry and Music, ch. i.—This absurd notion was also long ago combated in a masterly manner by that fine and philosophical writer, La Motte, in the discourse prefixed to his Odes, p. 23—31.

[°] Nоте 45, р. 239.

This looks much, as if he would have affented to the rational affertion of Eratofihenes, which Strabo combats, $-\pi \omega \pi \tau \pi \pi \sigma \tau \sigma \chi \alpha \zeta \varepsilon \sigma \theta \alpha \iota \Psi \Upsilon X A \Gamma \Omega \Gamma \iota A \Sigma$, OY $\Delta \iota \Delta \Lambda \Sigma K A \Lambda \iota A \Sigma$. Strabo, p. 15. And fee the Diff. on the Idea of Univ. Poetry, above referred to.

fure; as Castelvetro, long ago, rightly contended. "Coloro, che "vogliono, che la poesia sia trovata principalmente per giovare, "o per giovare & per dilettare insieme, veggano che non s'oppon- gano all' autorità d'Aristotele, il quale, qui cd altrove, non par che le assegni altro, che diletto; e se pure le concede alcuno giova- mento, gliele concede per accidente; come è la purgatione dello spa- vento & della compassione per mezzo della Tragedia." p. 505.

The peculiar end of Tragedy, he has expressly told us, is to afford that pleasure, which results from sictitious terror and pity:

THY ÂTO ELER HOLL POSE DIA MUMPTEWS HOUNDY.—What he regarded as the peculiar end of Epic Poetry, I observe that he has no where distinctly said. But from what he has said, of the advantages which its plan affords, with respect to grandeur, and variety, and the admission of the wonderful and surprising to, and also of the superior richness of its language to, we may collect, that his ideas on this subject accorded with those of the best modern critics; and that he held the end of the Epic Poem to be, according to the exact description of an eminent writer, "admiration, produced by a "grandeur of design, and variety of important incidents, and sufficient tained by all the energy and minute particularity of description."

This end, however, and these peculiar advantages, of the Epic plan, Aristotle has not, as I have before remarked k, brought forward, to complete the comparison in this chapter: but he plainly, and, I think, justly, considered them as more than compensated by the closer interest, more perfect illusion, stronger emotion, deeper impression, and, in bis view, more useful tendency, of Tragedy. The Epic Poem loses in force of effect, what it gains in variety; in nature and passion, what it gains in grandeur and sublimity. The very necessity, and the merit, of its variety, and of the execute [&]amp; Cap. xxiv .- Transl. Part III. Sect. 2.

h Cap. xxii. ad fin. and cap. xxiv.—Διο και γεωττας, εεc. Transl. p. 113, and 117.

i Dr. Hurd's Disc. on Poet. Imit. p. 141.

k P. 39.

diev dioquoios estentiolog, are a confession of its desects, as implying a too great extent of plan, a seebleness of interest, a want of relief. It seems, indeed, to be the great art of the Epic Poet, to make us amends, by the striking beauty of particular parts, for the satigue and ennui which unavoidably results, more or less, from the whole. A strong proof of the superiority of Tragedy, and of the justness of Aristotle's decision, is, that every reader is most delighted with the Episodes of Epic Poetry; with those subordinate and more compressed actions, which give us the very pleasure of Tragedy—which interest and affect us by exciting pity and terror: with the meeting of Hector and Andromache, and the supplication of Priam to Achilles for the body of his son, in the Iliad; with the love, despair, and death, of Dido, the episode of Nisus and Euryalus, and the parting scene between old Evander and his son, in the Eneid.

But though, of all the pleasures which Poetry, or Music, or Painting, can afford, the pleasure of emotion deserves to be esteemed the greatest, yet all those arts certainly afford considerable pleasures of other kinds; and, perhaps, to do full justice to the Epic Poem, we ought not to characterize it by any one particular and principal pleasure, but by that variety, which is peculiar to it, and which comprehends, in some degree or other, every fort of pleasure, that serious Poetry can give. Whatever, therefore, may be decided m An. VIII. 557, &c.—particularly, from v. 572 to 584. I do not know any where a finer example of natural pathos, heightened by the nicest selection of expression, and by such harmony of verification, as would almost make nonsense pass upon the understanding for sense, through the recommendation, if I may be allowed such an expression, of the ear.

¹ Cap. xxiv.

n Some writers give still greater latitude to the variety of Epic Poetry. And indeed, if what should, or may, be done, is to be determined by what has been done by the best Epic Poets—by Homer, Virgil, and Tasso, (for Ariosto is a comic Poet,) it even admits, occasionally, of some departure from rigid dignity, and of some approach, at least, to the smile of Comedy, though not to the broad laugh of Farce. See Lord Kaims, Elem. of Criticism, vol. i. p. 289, and the treatise Περι Όμης ποιησεως, γ. 257, vol. v. of Ed. Hom. Ernest.

with respect to the comparative excellence of the Poems themselves, we may safely perhaps assent to the general decision of criticism, respecting the comparative merits of the Poets, and allow, that "the first praise of genius is due to the writer of an Epic Poem; "as it requires an assemblage of all the powers which are singly "fussicient for other compositions"."

" Dr. Johnson's Life of Milton.

THE END.

ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS.

- AGE 15, Note (w). It ought to have been mentioned, that this book of the Odyssey was not translated by Pope himself, but by Fenton.
- P. 95. By AGATHO.] Perhaps I ought rather to have adhered to the old and best authenticated reading, ἀγαθοι. Victorius sound Αγαθων only in one MS. and was induced to prefer it, principally because the other reading could not well be reconciled with his interpretation of the passage. He also objects, that the conjunction, και, in that reading, would have no meaning, "cum effet, illo passo, nihil quad coputaleret." But και must then be rendered etiam, and, indeed, can be understood no otherwise, if we read ἀγαθον; and the sense will be—" as Achilles is made a good "character even by Homer;" as if he had added—who has so well observed the δμοιον, the historical likeness, and has painted in so strong colours the angry violence of his temper. This sense would be sufficiently expressed in my translation, by reading—" as Achilles is drawn, even by Homer."
- P. 121, Note 9. "But that part," &c.] I found reason to alter my opinion, and the NOTE referred to, after this note on the translation was printed. Dele, therefore, "But that part," &c. to "Seel. 22," inclusively. And read—See the NOTE.
- P. 171. It escaped me, till that note was printed, that Ælian also says, "Dio"nysius the Colophonian:" it must therefore be allowed to be probable, that if Aristotle and Plutarch speak of the same painter, so do also Aristotle and Ælian. The difficulty, however, pointed out, of reconciling Ælian's account with that of Aristotle, will still remain.
- P. 195. Though I think it clear, that Stanley mifunderstood the passage of Aristotle, I confess it is by no means clear, that he misunderstood that of Philostratus. This, therefore, was too hastily advanced: for though the general use of the adverb

 άποταδην

ADDITIONS AND CORRECTIONS.

ἀποταδην certainly favours the fense in which I understood the passage, yet I sear there is no good authority for the word χος, used as we use chorus, to signify the choral ode or song. It always, I believe, means the choral performers. The verb, συνεσείλε, also contributed to mislead me, if I was misled; as it is more applicable to the contrastion of prolivity, than to the diminution of number. Yet it is used in the same sense, and on the same subject, by Jul. Pollux, IV. 15, ad sinem.

P. 289. See also the description, in the Trachinia of Sophocles, of Hercules dashing out the brains of Lichas against a rock, v. 779-782.

P. 300. "Purple dreffes," &c.] — χορηγ@- ἀιζεθεις, 'ΙΜΑΤΙΑ ΧΡΥΣΑ ΠΑΡΑΣΧΩΝ ΤΩι ΧΟΡΩι, ραπ@- φοζει.

Translated by Grotius, — — "Aut lectus scenæ præbitor, "Aureas gregi cum vestes dederit, sert centunculum."

Antiphanes, apud Athen. p. 103. Grotii Excerpta, &c. p. 627.

- P. 374, Note 135. The alteration, however, from ΘΕΑτα, to ΠΟΙΗταν, is rather violent; and it is suggested to me by Castelvetro's conjecture, that Aristotle might, perhaps, express the sense given by Dacier, without using the word ποιμταν, and that what he said might be this: "which escaped him [i. e. Carcinus] for want of seeing the action, as a spectator."—ò μα δρωντα ΩΣ [or ΩΣΗΕΡ] θεαταν [sc. δυτα] ελανθανεν. This is savoured by the preceding expression,—'ΟΡΩΝ, ΩΣΠΕΡ παρ αυτοις γιγνομεν τοις πραπτομενος.
- P. 394. "παιδιον—never used but to signify a child."]—Unless iποκοςτείνως, as a term of endearment; as we often apply child to a grown person: a sense in which it can hardly be used here.
- P. 475. "One Tragedy at each différent festival."] And thus, I find, Menage understood. "On ne representoit, chacun de ces jours-là, qu'un poeme de chaque "poete." Pratique de Theatre, par D'Aubignac, ii. p. 48.

I N D E X I.

OF POETS, CRITICS, PHILOSOPHERS, &c.

MENTIONED BY ARISTOTLE.

Α.

ÆSCHYLUS - - Page 72. 102. 111, 112.

AGATHO - - - - - - 82. 95. 102, 103.—A Tragic Poet, the contemporary of Socrates, Euripides, &c. A few fragments only of his works remain, which confirm the account given by antient writers of his flyle; that it abounded with ornamental refinements, and particularly with artitlefes. [See Elian, V. H. XIV. 13. and Arifogh. The finite v. 58, &c. and Kufter's note.] The following lines may afford a pretty good specimen of his turn, both of writing and thinking:

Τεχιπ τιχην έσειξε, και τυχη τεχιην.

Arift. Ethic. Nic. VI. 5.

Το μεν παζεργού, έζγον ώς, ποιαμιθα, Το δ' έργοι, ώς παζεγγού, έκποικμεδα.

Ashen, V. init.

See also NOTE 156.—Grotil Excepts on Trag. Sec. p. 437. Engle, Art. Agartion. And Sydenham's translation of the Συμπο, w of Plato, (The Eunquet,) p. 9, 1.. 122, note 96.

ARIPHRADES - - - - 112. He is known only by the wretched place of projace criticism there mentioned.

Aristophanes - - - 69.

4 D

ASTYDAMAS

ASTYDAMAS - Page 91. There were two Tragic Poets of this name, father and son. The former is said to have written not sewer than 240 Tragedies. Suidas:—who has also recorded his vanity, art. Saura emanues.

C.

- Callippides - 132, 133. A famous Tragic actor. See Plutarch, · Apophthegm. Lacon. p. 376, ed. H. St. From the story there told, it seems probable enough, though, I think, by no means certain, that the proverbial expression, Τραγιαθ πιθααθ, (ἐπι των παρ' ἀξιαν ΣΕΜΝΥΝΟΜΕΝΩΝ, Suid. and Hespeh.) might, as it has been supposed, have originally alluded to the vanity of this actor. In the Symposium of Xenophon, when the bussion, Philip, is asked—Επι το γελωτοποιείν μεγα φρονείς;—he answers, Δικαιστερον γ', διομαί, ἡ ΚΑΛ-ΛΙΗΗΙΔΗΣ ὁ ὑποιηνίτης, ὁς ΥΠΕΡΣΕΜΝΥΝΕΤΑΙ ότι δυναται ποίλεις κλαιοντας καθιζείν. p. 880, ed. Leunclavii.—It seems much more doubtful, whether the passages referred to by Dacier, in Suetonius, Tiber. cap. 38. and Cic. ad Attic. lib. xiii. ep. 12, have the same allusion.
- CARCINUS - 95. 98. Of this Tragic Poet only a few trifling lines are preferved. What Suidas fays of him gives us no very high idea of his genius; viz. that, of 160 Tragedies which he composed, one only obtained the prize in the dramatic contests.
- CHEREMON - 67. IIS.—See NOTE II. For the passage there mentioned, and other fragments, the reader may also see Grotii Excerpta, p. 845, and Sir William Jones's Poef. Ajat. Comment. p. 408.
- CHIONIDES - - 69. One of the carliest and most eminent Athenian Poets of the old Comedy. Suidas.
- CLEOPHON - 68. 110. Sec NOTE 14.
- CRATES - - 74. He is faid to have flourished about 12 or 15 years before Aristophanes; of course, in the time of the old Comedy.

D.

DICEOGENES - - - 96. Tragic and Dithyrambic Poet. Suid.

DIONYSIUS - - - 68. See NOTE 12, and the additions and corrections.

E.

EMPEDOCLES - - - 67. 108. 128. The Sicilian Poet-philosopher, contemporary with Sophoeles. See NOTES 8 and 9, and p. 128, note 4. He is often quoted by Aristotle, and many fragments of his Poetry are preserved in various antient authors. See Diog. Lacet. in vitá: the Poess Philosophica of H. St. phens, &c.

I N D E X I.

EPICHARMUS - Page 69. 73.—of Syracuse, a philosophical and a comic Poet. The names of 40 of his Comedies are recorded, and a considerable number of fragments from them, and some from his philosophical poetry, are extant. See Grotii Excerpta, and the Poes. Philos. of H. Stephens.

Fuclip - - - 111. Of what Euclid Aristotle speaks, it seems impossible to ascertain. Victorius says, he is here called the old Euclid, to distinguish him from Euclid the philosopher, the disciple of Socrates, and sounder of the Megaric sect. [Diog. Laert. in vità.] But as that Euclid sourished, according to the common account, about 60 years before Aristotle, he might well enough be called à agraid, and there is certainly no improbability in supposing a cavilling logician to have been also a cavilling critic. See Diog. Laert. and Bayle, art. Euclide.

EURIPIDES - - 88. 90. 99. 102. 111, 112. 124. 131.

G.

GLAUCO - - - 129. Whether this was Glauco the Teian mentioned by Aristotle, Rhet. III. 1, as Dacier asserts after Robortelli, is very uncertain.—I know not why Goulston, in his version, calls him "Glauco Sophista."

H.

HEGEMON - - - 68. See NOTE 15.

HERODOTUS - - - 82.

HIPPIAS, of Thases - 127.—known, I believe, only from this mention of him.

Homer - - - - 67, 68, 69. 71. 80. 95. 111. 115, 116. 118, 119. 121.

MI.

MAGNES - - - 69. An Athenian Poet of the old Comedy. Stide:

MNASITHEUS - - - 133.—of whom nothing more is known.

Myniscus - - - 132. I do not know that he is any where elfe mentioned, except by Atheneus, who calls him "the Tragic actor, Mynifeus," and gives him an honourable place in his Memoirs of Gluttony, hb. vin. p. 344.

N.

NICOCHARIS (or NICOCHARES) 68. - In NOTE 16, I have, with Dacier and others, supposed him to be the Athenian Comic Peet, contemporary with Aristophanes. [Suidas.] But this seems doubtful. Victorius thinks, with some 4 D 2.

reason, that Aristotle added, ο του Δηλαδία, in order to distinguish him from that Poet. And, farther, he is here instancing in narrative or Epic Poetry, and the Deliad was certainly a Poem of that kind. But no such Poem is attributed to Nicochares the Comic Poet.

P.

Pauson - - Page 68. See NOTE 12, p. 169, 170.

Philoxenus - 68.—of Cythera, contemporary with Plato; a Tragic and Dithyrambic Poet, famous for his mufical innovations, his jokes, and his glutteny. See Dr. Burney's Hift. of Mulic, vol. i. p. 418, &c.—Mem. de l'Acad. des Inferip. touse xix. p. 315, collavo.—But there were feveral perfons of the fame name, and, unfortunately, of fimilar character, who appear to have been confounded with each other, even by antient writers themselves. See Perizonius, Ælian, V. Hist. X. 9.

Phormis [Phormos, Athen. and Suid.] - - 73. A Sicilian Comic Poet contemporary with Epizharmus.

Polygnorus - - 63. 77.—See Note 12.—Pliny, N. Hift. lib. xxxv. cap. 9.— Ælian, V. Hift. IV. 3. where Perizonius points out, as some illustration of the passage of Aristotle, cited Note 12, p. 169, a picture of this painter, mentioned by Pausanias, (in Phocicis,) which represented the punishment of an undutiful son in the infernal regions.

POLYIDES, the Sof hist, 97. 99.—does not occur, that I know of, any where else. The title of Sof high from sufficiently to diffinguish him, if the name does not, (for in some MSS, it is ΠολυείδΟΣ,) from Polyidus the Dithyrambic Poet, Musician, and Painter, mentioned by Diodor. Siculus, [lib. xiv.] and Etymol. Mag. voce Ατλας.

PROTAGORAS - - 104. See NOTE 165.

S.

Sophocles - 69. 72. 91. 94. 96, 97. 102. 124. 134.

Sophron - - - 66. This famous Sicilian Poet was contemporary with Euripides. He wrote Alimes, fome for male, and others for female characters, in the Doric dialect. Some very obscure fragments are preserved by Demetrius, Athenicus, &c. See NOTE 6, p. 161, 162.

Sosistratus - - 133. A rhapfodift.

STHENELUS - - 110. See NOTE 194. He is mentioned, I believe, only by Aristotle, and by Harpocration, who records him as a Tragic Poet of the age of Pericles, and says, that he was accused of plagiarism.

T. THEODECTES

Т.

- THEODECTES Page 97. 100. A Rhetorician, of Phofelis in Lytia; the feliolar of Plato and Ifocrates. He is said to have composed 50 Tragedies, and an Art of Rhetoric in verse. He is frequently mentioned by Aristotle, Dion. Halicarn. Quintilian, &cr. His fellow-citizens creded a status to his memory. See Plut. in vità Alexandri, p. 1236, ed. H. S. Only a few trisling fragments of his works remain.
- TIMOTHEUS - 68. See NOTE 17. The famous Poet-mufician of Miletus, contemporary with Euripides. He was banished by the Sportans for improving a musical instrument by the addition of a few shings, which they called "differ nouring the antient Music, and "corrunting the ears of youth:"—πομανεται τας αποας των νεων. The words of this curious decree are preserved by Boethius. See Casarh. in Athen. p. 613, or page 66, 67, of the Ox. ed. of Aratus. The reader will find a full and entertaining account of Timotheus in Dr. Burney's Hist. of Music, vol. i. p. 405.
- TYNDARUS [al. PINDARUS] 133.—An actor, clearly; but we know nothing farther.

X_{\bullet}

- XENARCHUS - 66. A Comic Poet, of whom the reader may see a pleasant fragment in Athen. p. 225, describing a curious trick practised by the Athenian fishmongers to evade the law by which they were sorbid to pour water upon their stale sish in order to make them appear fresh. See Grotii Excerpta ex Trag. &c. p. 697.
- XENOPHANES - 124. The Colophonian, eminent in the class of philosophical Poets, or, rather, poetical philosophers, about the time of Pythagoras. See NOTE 238.—Diog. Laert. IX. 18.—Bayle, art. XENOPHANES.

\mathbf{Z} .

ZEUXIS - - 77. 130. The famous painter. See the note p. 130, and.
NOTE 254.

INDEX II.

TO THE DISSERTATIONS AND NOTES.

The letter n refers to the notes at the bottom of the page.

Α.

ACCENTS, no term applied to them by Aristotle but acute, and grave, Page 422.

Achilles, how characterized by Euripides, 351.—by Homer, 352.—by Plato, 353.—by Dr. Jortin, ibid.

Acts, five-no fuch division applicable to the Greek drama, 297.

Actors, Greck, played female parts, 133, n. 550, 551.—contended for the prize in the dramatic contests, 278, 279.—their influence over the Poets, 279.—their dress and figure, 480, and n.

Actresses, not admitted on the Greek stage, 41, n. 133, n.

Αδυναμια, 500, n.

Агиму, Агиеги 9-, 464, 465.

ÆLIAN, of descriptive imitation, 10, n. 36.—his account of the paintings of Dionysius mistaken by Dacier, 170, 171.—of the infant state of painting, 189, n.—quoted, 553.

ÆSCHYLUS, not fild by Ariffetle to have diminished the number of choral performers, 195.—curious account of his stage-improvements, 198, 199.—his chorus of 50 suries, 316.—his Ocean riding on a Griffin, 317.—his Prometheus, 384.—an expression of his illustrated, 443.—his destion, 469.

AGATHO,

I N D E X II.

AGATHO, a fragment of, Page 407.

Aισχρον, its wide fignification, 214.

Aλκιγε ἀπολογ, to what books of the Odyssey that title extended, 364-366.

'Αμαςτια, 'Αμαςτηματα, 308.

Αμφιβολια, Aristotle's sense of, 522.

Aναβολαι, Dithyrambic—what, 180.

Aναλογια, Aristotle's definition of, 437, n.

ANTIENTS, not to be read with modern ideas, 147.

Autingu, whether used by Aristotle to denote opposition of meaning, 527%.

Απεργασια, 191.

Αποπλες, 347.

Απο σκηνης, δι, οτ τα, 302.

ARCHITECTURE, abfurdity of claffing it with the imitative arts, 60, n.

Αρχιτεκτονική, 417.

Αργα μερη, 121, n.

ARIOSTO, unity of his Poem, of what kind, 81, n. 115, n. - ψευδη λεγει ως δει, 488.

ARISTIDES QUINTILIANUS, his account of the Greek 'Aquoviai, 53.—confirms a reading of Aristotle, 421.—quoted, 150, n.—illustrates Aristotle, 415, 416.

Aristophanes, 201, n.—(or Antiphanes) a fragment of, 259.—ridicules the prolixity of the Tragic chorus, 196.—a fragment of, explained by a passage of Aristotle, 452, 453.

ARISTOTLE, has no where faid that ALL POETRY is imitation, 24, n.—in what fenfes he confidered Poetry as imitation, 25, 26. 39.—takes no notice either of fonorous or descriptive imitation, and why, 26, 27. 36, 37.—inferiority of that part of his work, which treats of diction, 37. 419 .- how far he would have allowed an Epic imitation in profe to be a Poem, 153. 273.—by no means excluded verse from his idea of Poetry, 157. 192.—his preference of Dramatic Poetry, 39, 563, 564.—has not fully stated the comparative merits of Dramatic and Epic Poetry, 39, and n.-held pleasure to be the chief end of Poetry, 561, 562.—his doctrine of the purgation of the passions by Tragedy, an answer to the objections of Plato, 239, 240.—his advice to the Tragic Poet, to affirt his imagination by action, in composing, considered, 377.—scope of his chapter on Critical Objections, &c. 122, n.—free from an error common to philosophical critics, 269.—his style often elliptic, parenthetical, and embarrassed, 143. 185. 271. 344. 396, and n. 404. 430. does not affert, in general, that thusic. is an imitative art, 59.—his account of mufical imitative, 46, 47.—what he underfload understood by the resemblence of melody and rhythm to manners, or tempers, 52—57.—a musical ir blem of his corrected, translated, and examined, 54—57.—his rhetoric quoted, 157. 220, and n. 255. 279. 289. 307. 320, 321. 349. n. 351. 365. 375. 377. 384, n.—(of the Ethic and Pathetic Tragedy) 400, and n. 436. 438. 439.—(of the language of passion) 493, 494. 461. 463. 466. 532.—(of the dissippointment of the ear by the abrupt conclusion of a period) 557, 558.—explained, 180. 423—translated, 186. 190. 448. 470, 471. 488, 489.—his Ethics quoted, 184. 263. 273. 273. 287. 320. 328, 309. 437. 548.—his Polit. 47. 53. 54. 148. n. 169. 234, 235, 236. 274. 543. 555. 559—Metaphys. 192. 269. 288.—De Soph. Elench. 174. 422. 520.—Topic. 272. 426. 444. 574. 526.—De Interpret. 430, 431. 532.—De Mundo, 548.—De Hist. Animal. 330.—Problems, 55. 178, 179. 187. 195, 196. 302. 408. 482.

ARISTOXENUS, of the mole dy of speech, 51, n.—of the effect of passion upon it, 52, n.—of the essential difference between singing and speaking, ibid. 296, n.

Account, notably, not barmony, 210, n.— Asktonn, 210.

Agrenza, or M. Silies, of the Greeks, not the same with their Toros, or Modes, 53, n. ATHENIANS, their immoderate fondness for dramatic exhibitions, 267, 268, 479, 480.

AUDIENCE, Athenian—eat and drank during the performance, 480.

AULUS GELLIUS, his flory of Polus the Tragic actor, 550.

В.

DACH, C. P. Dman. his choral recitative, 294, n.

BACON, Lord, 253.

BATTEUX, his explanation of Dithyrambic imitation, 139, 140.—of Aristotle's dramatic καθαζτις, 237—240.

Bs write, Dr. his miliake with respect to a passage of Reusseau, 6, n—his Minstrel, 13.—of the relation between muical founds and mental affections, 47, n—his objections to the principle of resemblance to pathetic speech in pathetic music, could red, 53, n—on the power of association in music, 59, n. 147, n.—of the discrence between mental and is tical perfection, 68, n.—his account of a possage of that, 158, n.—has explain ion of Aristotic's account of the ridiculou, 214, —his jud antipuls of the character of Homer's Achilles, 353.—on the language of the gody, 406.

BEAUTY, fize and firength effectial to it, according to the ideas of the antients, 263—265.—n ale and firm e, Arightle's idea of it, 263, 264.

BLGINNING, mid le, and end—Ariflothe's definition of them applied and illustrated, 258—162.

BLLL,

Bell, the found of it affected by its swinging, Page 14, n.

BENI, his commentary on Aristotle quoted, 266. 402. 496, n.

Βλαβερου, 534, 535.

BLACKWELL, 43, n.

Boileau, a famous imitative line of his examined, 8, n.—quoted, 290, 452, n.

Bossu, Le, called, with little reason, Aristotle's best interpreter, 284. 326.—misquotes Aristotle's text, 24, n.—his idea of Episodes, examined, 210, 211, 212, n.—his mistaken notion of Aristotle's simple stable, 283.—his absurd interpretation of xgnsa non, 325, 326.—his defence of Homer's mean words, 452, n.—his idea of Homer's purpose in composing his Poems, 561, and n.

Brumoy, his indifferent way of vindicating the antients from the charge of Tragicomedy, 204.—his apology for the bloody exhibition of Oedipus in Sophocles, 290.

Burgess, Mr. his rational account of Homer's language, 457.

Burke, Mr. 375.

Burney, Dr. of the power of instrumental Music, 50, n.—of the old German Comedy, 318, n.—his translation of the hymn of Dionysius to the Sun, 446, n.—of the melody of the antient declamation, 247, n.

C.

CALLIMACHUS, his hymns, 139.

CAMPBELL, Dr. his explanation of Aristotle's account of the ridiculous, 215-218.

—of metaphors converted by familiar use into proper terms, 434.

CASAUBON, Ifaac, 28, n. 206, n.

CASES, 106, n.

CASTELVETRO, a transposition of his adopted, 252, and n.—conjectural emendations of, 375. 413.—a curious illustration of his, 436.—his explanation of ἀναλογον in cap. xxiv. 483, n.—of ἀργα μερη, 492.—his commentary quoted, 26, n. 228, n. 279. 459. 474. 554. 562, 563.

CATULLUS, 304.

CECILIA, 407.

CHEREMON, his poetical character, 168 .- his Centaur, ibid.

Χαλεπαινειν, not used transitively, nor synonymous with δεγιζεσθαι, 379-382.

CHAUCER, 314, 315.

XEIMaiveir, 379, 380, and n.

CHOEPHOR E, the Tragedy of that name mentioned by Aristotle, (p. 96) probably not that of Æschylus, 367, 368.

4 E

CHORAGI,

Choraci, Page 89, n.

Χος@- διαλεκτικ@-, 294.

Chorus, antient dramatic, its gradual extinction, 103, n.—its prolixity, 196.—
perfons of, speak of themselves in the singular number, even in the Odes, where they sing together, 298, n.—its visible number sometimes filled up by the admission of mutes, 300.—its entrance, a shewy and expensive part of the Greek drams, 300.—in what sense required by Aristotle to be a sharer in the action, 408, 409.

Χέμεα ήθη, 325.

X:5-3-, 328.

CHROMATIC, and Enharmonic, melody of the Greeks, imitative of speech, 51.

CICERO, 153, n. 154, n. 180. 279, n. 541, n.—his account of the ridiculous, agreeing with Ariftotle's, 218.—his orations, compared with those of Demosthenes, illustrate Aristotle's distinction of the rhetorical and political styles, 255, n.—of poetic enthusiasm, or genius, 384.—illustrates a passage of Aristotle, 424.

CIRCUMFLEX accent, called grave by Aristotle, 422, and n.—whether distinguished, in his time, by any appropriated term, 422, 423, and n.

CLARISSA, 304. 407.

CLEUPHON, his poetical character, 174. 451.

Comedy, Old and Middle, what we call Farce, 194.—their object was the laughable in general, 217, 218.

Comedy, usual intricacy of its first scenes, 258, 259,—a disadvantage of it, compared with Tragedy, 259.

CONDILLAC, 243, n.

Contests, Dramatic, of the Greeks, their variety, 479, 480.

Cresphontes, of Euripides, the discovery in it, in what view admired by Aristotle, 323, 324.

CRITICISM, philosophical, a common mistake of, 7, n. 269.

CYCLOPS of Euripides, a fingular circumstance relative to it, 207, 208.

D.

DACTER, his mistake relative to the Old and Middle Comedy, 224.—his strange affertion relative to the constant observation of the unities of time and place in the Greek Trag dis, 229.—his idea of Aristotle's simple sable, 283.—his abfurd explanation and salfe translation of a passage in Aristotle, 326, and n.—his absurd account of the number of Greek Tragedies performed in a day, 476, 477.—tays the Riad may be read in a day, 478.

D'ALEMBERT,

D'ALEMBERT, Page 45, n.—makes Architecture an imitative art, 60, n.

Dance, Pantomimie, 149.

DANCER, Pantominic, his necessary accomplishments, according to Lucian, 546, no

DANTE, his description of the mingled founds of his Inferno, 12, 13.

D'Aubignac, of perfect dramatic conclusions, 262, and n.

DEMETRIUS, (Π egi 'Egµ.) 204, and n. 251, n. 294, n.—of the analogical metaphor, 442.

DESCRIPTION, when imitative, 9 .- not to be confounded with expression, 18.

DESCRIPTION, imitative—of visible objects, 9.—of sounds, 11—15.—of mental objects, immediate, or by their sensible effects, 15—19.—not all exact and minute description, imitative, 28, 29, n.

Description, local and picturefque—the remarkable inferiority of the antients to the moderns in fuch description stated, and its cause conjectured, 30—36.

Δεσις, nœud, complication, 392, 393.

Διαδείν, 548.

DIALOGUE of the Greek Tragedy, to what fort of melody it was probably fet, 247. Διαφερεί, 4.60.

DICTION, Tragic, 467, and n. 468.—Aristotle's idea of its perfection, 470.—sketch of its history in his Rhetoric, 471.

Διδασκαλια, 4ΙΙ.

Διδασμειν τραγωδίαν, origin of that expression, 416.

DIDEROT, 408.—of the Andria of Terence, 260, n.—illustrates a precept of Arifotle, 99, n.—of the difficulty of planning a drama, 253.

DIGNITY, modern Tragic, not to be found in the Greek Tragedy, 200-207. 250, 251. 289. 338.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, of the Tetralogiæ, 475.

DIONYSIUS, of Halicarnassus, his account of the regularity and simplicity of the old Dithyrambic, 179.—of the melody of the Parode in the Orestes of Euripides, 294, 295.

Dionysius, the painter, 170.

Dionysius, a fine passage of his Hymn to the Sun, 445.

Disaster, 288.

Discovery, of Joseph by his brethren, 85, n.—of Telemachus by Menelaus, in the Odyssey, 364.—in the Choëphoræ of Æschylus, examined, 368, 369.—between Merope and her son in the Cresphontes of Euripides—Aristotle's view of it, 323, 324.—its effect upon the audience described by Plutarch, 325.

Discoveries, various, in the Odyssey, 116, n.

I N D E X II.

DITHYRAMBIC Poetry, how imitative, Page 137, 138.—not originally fo, but of a fimple form, in regular stanzas, and set to the simplest melody, 178, 179.—how it became imitative, refined, and complicated, 179.

Docere fabulam, 416.

Dog, a philosophical animal, according to Plato, 188.

Domenichino, in painting, practifed a precept of Aristotle, 376.

DRAMATIC, or personative, Poetry, imitation, in the strict sense of the word, 21, 22.

DRAMATIC SYSTEM of the antients, upon a large scale, 480.

DRUNKEN men, exhibition of them on the stage, an improvement of Æschylus, 199.

DRYDEN, misrepresents Aristotle, 186. 556.—read him only in translations, 186, 187, n.

Du Bos, his absurd idea of the declamation of the antient Tragedy, 242, 243.—his strange explanation of a passage of Aristotle, 248.

E.

Echo, of found to fenfe, 21, n.

Ндп, 167. 472.

Εκδεχεσθαι, 490.

Εκπληξις, Aristotle's definition of it, 504.

EMENDATIONS conjectural, fuggested, of Aristotle, 55. 149. 152. 186, n. 196. 219. 226. 235 272. 278. 347. 351. 357. 378. 406. 412. 435. 441. 461.-465. 472. 481. 495. 499, 500. 523. 530, 531. 549. 553.

of Plato, 154, n.

____ of Plutarch, 306.

of Æschylus, 443, n.

of Aristides Quintilianus, 415.

EMPEDOCLES, his two physical principles of friendship and strife, 128, n.—a quotation from him explained, ihid.—his philosophical Poetry, 164.—his diction allowed by Aristotle to be Homeric, 165.

Εναργεια, 30, π.

Εναργες, 552.

ENHARMONIC intervals of the Greeks, imitations of speech, 51.

Epic Poem, Aristotle's rule for the length of it, considered, 474—478.—what was his idea of its proper end, 563.—its merits and desects, compared with Tragedy, 563, 564.—now and then approaches to the ludicrous, ibid. n.

EPICHARMUS, philosophized in Trochaics, 164.—his ludicrous description of the voracity of Hercules, 203, n.

ETTIEINTHE

I N D E X II,

Eπιεικεια, Page 349, and n.

Επιεικεις, δι, 548.

Episode, in what fenses used by Aristotle, 210—213. 388, 389.—how it came to fignify an incidental and digressive story, 212, 213.—Epic and Tragic, their difference, 212.

EPITHETS, negative, frequent in the Greek Poets, 447.

EPOPOEIA, difficulty of admitting Aristotle to have proposed the application of that term to Mimes and Dialogues, 159—161.

ERATOSTHENES, his just idea of the end of Poetry, 562, n.

ERNESTUS, his interpretation of two words in Homer, 15, n. 265.

ΕθΦ λεξεως, 524.

Hen, dispositions, tempers, 47, n.

HθΦ, HθωΦ, in what sense applied by Aristotle to Tragedy, 100, n. 399.—opposed to παθΦ and παθητιώΦ, 250, n. 396, and n.

EUBULUS, tragment of a Comedy of his, 331.

EUCLID, illustrates Aristotle, 424, 425.

Euguns, 382, 383.

Euripides, Aristotle's censure of his Choral Odes, 102, n.—a passage of, proving the licentiousness of antient painting, 169.—sometimes samiliar, and Tragicomic, 200. 202, 203, 204.—his Prologues, 220.—in@ of his Tragedies, 251.—did not observe the French rule, "de ne pas ensanguanter le Theatre," 291.—a passage in his Iphig. in Taur. considered, 303, n.—his powers not confined to emotions of tenderness and pity, 310.—two sine passages in his Medea and Electra, 31 3, 311.—his character of Achilles, 351.—his Tragic cavern, 377, 378.—his diction, and Aristotle's character of it, 470.—in what sense said to have drawn men as they are, 506—509.—imitated common nature more closely than Sophocles, 509, 510.

Ευσυνοπτον, 266, 267.

Expression, redundant, an instance of it frequent in the Greek writers, 231.

Expression, Mufical, confidered as imitation by the antients, and why, 46-51.—how affifted by words, though by no means dependent on them, 48.

F.

FABLE, double, of Aristotle, not to be confounded with our double plot, 312-FELIBIEN, 376.

FICTION, imitation, 19.

FISTULA PANIS.—See SYRINX,

FLUTF, antient, (Ac. D.,) Page 148, n.

FLUTE-PLATERS, antient, 545.

I'on fenelle, his Platonic idea of instrumental Music, 49, n.—his Pastorals, 163.—of Hercules in the Alcestis of Eurip. 203.—his Reflexions sur a Poetique, 272, 273.—his idea of Æschylus, 384.—of sublimity, 385, n.—his strange notion of Homer's dialects, 455—457.

FOOTE, 383, and n.

G.

Γλωτται, 462, 463.

Gods, Heathen, well characterized in three lines of Xenophanes, 512.

GOLDSMITH, his description of village sounds in a summer's evening, 13.

GRAVINA, 22, n.—his vindication of the Iphigenia of Euripides against Aristotle's centure of inconsistence, 343.

GRAY, Mr. his fondness for Racine, 385. - his Agrippina, ibid.

GREEK language, its comprehensive brevity of expression, 266, 267.

H.

HANDEL, 59.

HARMONY, faid by Aristotle to have no expression, 55.—that affertion not true of the harmony of modern counterpoint, 56, n.—what to be concluded from it with respect to the Music of the antients, ibid.

HARRIS, of fonorous imitation in a line of Virgil 5, n.—of the imperfection of such imitation, 8, n.—imitation of speech overlooked by him in his account of imitative Music, 46, n. 59.—of the difference between rhythm and metre, 70, n.—a translation of his considered, 257, and n.—an explanation of his questioned, 284.—his version of the words in which Aristotle defines περιπετεια, 286.—his just remark concerning a difficulty in translation, 383.—of naturalized metaphors, 434.

Heinsius, his excellent comment on Aristotle's rule relative to the goodness of Tragic manners, 326, 327.

HELEN, her talent of vocal mimicry, 42, n.

HERCULES, his comic jollity in the Alcestis of Euripides, 203, 204.—extravagant description of his voracity, 203, n.

HERODOTUS, 542.

HEYNE, 390. 475. 516.—his just idea of imitative versification, 7, n.—his explanation of διδασκαλ... applied to the Tragic Poet, 417, n.

HIPPIAS,

HIPPIAS, his Jesuitical theology, Page 520.

Hobbes, of Lucan, 118, n.—of probable fiction, 488, n.

Hogarth, 172.—his Analysis of Beauty, 403, n.

HOMER, called the best of Painters, 10, n.—his description of the finging of the nightingale, 14, 15.—his touches of local description how improved and finished by Pope, 31-33, and n—abfurdly embellished by his translators, 42, n—his description of the vocal mimicry of Helen, ibid.—hymns attributed to him, narrative, 139.—parodied by the antients, 175.—called by Plato the first of Tragic Poets, 209 .- his descriptions of female beauty, 264, 265 .- a fine passage in his Odyffey, 364.—remarks on the original division of his Poems, 365, 366. —his use of the verb χαλεπαινείν, 379—381.—his διΦ ύφος 29, &c.—how defended by Boileau, 452.—how best defended, ibid. -absurd notion of his dialects, 456.—his Poems regarded by Aristotle as too long, 478, 179.—his fictions, in what fense compared to the logical sophism à consequenti, 485-488. - his persect knowledge of all arts and fciences, ridiculed by Plato, 498. - a paffage of, confidered, and vindicated from metaphorical interpretation, 515, 516.—paffages of, confidered, 465, 525, and n.—his inaccuracies in geography, aftronomy, &c. cenfured by the Zoilifts, 536.—his hexameters, and those of Hesiod, sung to the lyre by Terpander, Timotheus, &c. 550.

Horace, 336, n.—his Odes fometimes dramatic, 138, and n.—his expression fometimes taken from Aristotle, 500.

Howes, Mr. his explanation of the διπλη συσασις, 312.

HUME, his objection to Aristotle's doctrine of the unity of sable, 268.

HURD, Bishop, his masterly vindication of the Italian Poets, and the genuine privileges of Poetry, 118, n.—quoted, 192.—his explanation of Aristotle's precept relative to uniformity of manners, examined, 333—338.—his vindication of the Iphigenia (in Aulis) of Euripides, considered, 339—343.—his explanation of the difference between the imitations of Sophocles, and those of Euripides, considered, 507—519.—of the language of passion, 494.—of the end of Poetry, 561.—of the proper end of Epic Poetry, 563.

HUTCHESON, Professor, accounts for the power of Music over the passions from resemblance to passionate speech, 51.

HYMNS, narrative, 139.

I;

IAGO, 535, and n. FAMBI, the Poems for called, acted, 274. Ixarws, 473, 474.

I N D E X II.

- IMITATION, strictly so called, what essential to it, Page 4.—not applicable to Poetry in any sense, that is not independent on metre, 24, n.—Aristotle's solution of the pleasure arising from it, 188, 189.—a singular application of Aristotle's doctrine on that subject, 290, 291.
- IMITATION, Poetic, (or by words,) various and confused accounts of it, 37, n. 38.—extended by some to that general sense, which comprehends all speech, 23. 28, n.—among the antients closely connected with personal, 41, 42.
- by found, 5-9.

 by defeription, 9-19.

 by fillion, 19-21.
- by personation, 21-22. mixture and various combination of these different species, 23, 24.
- by refemblance of verbal found and motion, its imperfection, 5, and n. 8, n.—how produced by the best Poets, 6, 7, n. 27.—not imitation in a strict and proper sense, 7, 8.
- and properly, imitation, 21.—descriptive, not noticed by Aristotle, and why, 36, 37.
- IMITATION, Musical, synonymous to expression, with the antients, but opposed to it by modern writers, 46, and n.
- IMITATIVE ARTS, confusion arising from that general denomination applied to Poetry, Music, and Painting, in classing the arts, 60, 61.—absurdity of extending it to Architecture, 60, n.
- INCIDENTS, how considered by Aristotle as arising, or not arising, from the action itself, 372, 373.
- Johnson, Dr. of Shakspeare's hasty conclusions, 101, n. 121, n.—of the unities of time and place, 230.—of the Tragic language of Addison and Shakspeare, 251, n.—his censure of Mr. Gray's Agrippina, 385, 386.—of the characters of Lothario and Lovelace, 535.—of the effect of the character of Iago on the spectator, ibid. n.—of the merit of the Epic Poet, 565.
- Jonson, Ben, prologue to the puppet-shew of Hero and Leander in his Bartholomew-Fair, 223.
- JORTIN, Dr. his character of Achilles, 353.
- Joseph, and his brethren, flory of, 85, n.
- IPHIGENIA (at Aulis) of Euripides—inconfishence attributed to her character by Aristotle, confidered, 341—344.
- ISOCRATES, 383, n.—of the privileges of Poetry, and the importance of verse to its effect, 495.

I N D E X IL

K.

KAIMS, Lord, his affertion, that harmony has "no relation to fentiment," examined,
Page 56, n.—of the rifible, 217.—his just character of Racine, 385.

Καταψηφισασθαι, 528.

Καθαρσις, (παθηματων,) confidered, 231-242.—a passage relative to it in Aristotle's Polit. examined and translated, 233-237.

Κειμενον (όνομα), 444.

Κεραν, Κερασαι, to pour out, 523.

KIVITING, 482.

Konuou &, 456, and n.

Koμμ@, what;—example of it, 301, 302.

Koρδαξ, the dance so called, 164, n.

Kooμ@, the ornamental word, what probably meant by it, 447-449.

Κυςιον (ονομα), its sense, 433, 434.

L.

La Fontaine, 491, 11.

LA MOTTE, 38.—combats the notion, that instruction is the end of Poetry, 562.—his account of Homer's diction, 452.

LANDSCAPE, no technical term equivalent to it in Greek or Roman writers, 35.

LANDSCAPE-PAINTING, not practifed, or not cultivated, by the Greeks, 34, 35.— its effect on the general taste for prospects and rural scenery, 35, 36.

LANGUAGE, natural, not always simple and familiar language, 467, n.

Aεξις, in what sense applied by Aristotle to the Parode of the Greek Tragedy, 293—295.—and λεγεσθαι, sometimes applied to recitative, or such singing as most resembles speech, 244. 293.

Λεχεποιης, 31, n.

LITTLE ILIAD, 115, n. 347.

Λογοι ψιλοι, not always prose, 154.

Aoy®, how used by Aristotle, 155.—and by Plato, ibid. n.—the speaking or dialogue part of Tragedy, 198. 254.—its sense in Aristotle's analysis of diction in general, 419, 420.

Longinus, of the inequalities of Sophocles, 202.—of the Odyssey, 251, n.—illustrates an expression of Aristotle, 494.

LUCAN, αυτ 🕒 δι' όλε άγωνιζεται. 118, n.

4 F

LUCIAN,

I N D E X II.

Lucian, of descriptive imitation, Page 10, n. 11, n.—of the pantomimic multital accompaniment, 145.—of the comic masks, 218, n.—of the dress of the antient Tragic actors, 480, n.—of the requisites of an accomplished pantomimic dancer, 546, n.

Ludius, of the Augustan age, the first landscape-p inter upon record, 34. Augus, denougment, development, 392, 393.

MI.

MADNESS, enthusiasin, of every kind, frequently so denominated by the antients, 384, and n.

MAFFEI, mistakes Aristotle, 324.

MANDRABULUS, a Poem of Cleophon, 174.

Mars 9, 384.

MANNERS, (or charaster,)—little of them in the Tragedy of a polified age, 250, 251.

—— Tragic, in what fenfe required by Arifforde to be good, and why; the rule intended as a compromise with Plato, 325—329.—Aristotle's precept relative to their uniformity, how to be understood, 333—338.

Manbaren, 186-191 .- a particular use of that verb, 522.

MARGITES, 193.

MARKLAND, his manner of defending Euripides against Aristotle's censure of his Iphigenia, 344.

MARMONTEL, M. mistakes Aristotle, 308, n. 328, n.—quoted, 377. 393.

MARVELLOUS, the dramatic, 316, 317.

MASKS, of the Old Comedy, caricaturas, 218.

MASON, Mr. his excellence in imitative description of founds, and particularly of prufical founds, 11—14.—example from his Carastacus, 12.—his idea of Tragic language, 467, n.—a fine example from his Carastacus of the simpler language of Tragedy, 468.

MATRON, a famous Parodift, 175.

Magain, 345.—of the French opera, described by Rousseau, ibia.

MEGALIOTÆ, 432.

Meispor, 557.

Μελεον, 303, 11.

Melody, pathetic—its imitation of the tones and inflections of impaffioned speech, 58, 59.—such imitation particularly remarkable in Pergolesi, Purcell, and Hendel, 59.—denied by Dr. Beattie, 58, n.

MELOPOEIA, what, Page 76, n.

MENG, used in three different musical senses, 246, n.

Menage, 552.

MENALIPPE, curious flory of, 93, n.

MENANDER, anecdote relative to the antient Chorus in a fragment of his, 300.

Merope.—See Discovery.

Meson, whether used by Aristotle to denote the circumflex accent, 421-425.

Mεταβασις, (of Tragedy,) what, 283.

METAMORPHOSES, of Ovid-unity of that Poem, of what kind, 81, 2.

METAPHOR, Ariflotle's principle of the pleasure we receive from it, 187.—various ways of guarding it, according to Ariflotle, 446, 447.

the analogical, or proportional, what; and how it differs from the metaphor a specie ad speciem, 4.37—440.—instances of it from Aristotle and Homer, 4.39, 4.40, and n.

METASTASIO, his Estratto della Poetica d' Avistotile, 229.

MICHAEL ANGELO, how characterized by Sir Jos. Reynolds, 510.

MILTON, a circumstance in his description of the sound of a bell, 14, n.—his excellence in imitative description of founds, and particularly of musical sounds, II—14.—his account of Aristotle's purgation of the passions by Tragedy, 241, 242.—prologue of his Comus, not more exceptionable than those of Euripides, 299, 300.

MIMES, of Sophron, 161-163.—not, probably, of the licentious cast of the Roman Mimes, 162.

Mimicry, vocal, its antiquity, 41, n. 143.—two remarkable inflances of it recorded by Homer, 41, n.

Molestus, φερτιμ⊕, 541, 11.

Monbondo, Lord, of the ftyle of Cicero's orations compared with that of his rhetorical and philosophical works, 256, n. [where add to the references, val. iii. p. 256.]—of Homer's language, 457.

Monologues, of the Greek Tragedy, whether fet to recitative, or air, 247, 248.

Moore, Profife, his erroneous explanation of Aristotle's unsugar, 235, n.

Mogia, species, 191, 192.

Musgov, 557.

Music, its whole power reducible to three diffind effects, 44.—how far it can raife ideas, 44, 45.49, n.—in what fenfes regarded as imitative by the moderns, and by the antients, 46.—ideas and language of the antients, on this fibject, accounted for, 46—51.—its power over the pallions, what, 48.—that power occurately expressed by Aristotle, 48, n.—does not depend on Poetry for its 4 F 2 expression, Page 49, and n.—its separation from Poetry, by whom complained of, 49, n.—allowed by Aristotle to have expression without words, 49, n. 55.—its power of affecting resolved by some writers into a resemblance, more or less, to the tones of speech, 51. 58.—the analogy of its melody and rhythm to those of speech, 51, 52, and n. 58.—impropriety of calling it an imitative art, according to the modern ideas of musical imitation, 60.—an antient division of it into three kinds, 233, 234.

I N D E X II.

Music, Antient, its improvements, like those of the modern, treated as corruptions, 179.

Music, Dramatic, of the Greeks, strictly imitative, 51.

Music, Instrumental, its power, 49, n.—a peculiar pleasure arising from the very indeterminateness of its expression, 49, n.—of the antients, 50.—in what sense considered by Aristotle as imitating manners and characters, 173, 174.

Music, Pasteral, affecting by affociation, 147, and n. 148.

Music, Vocal, almost folely cultivated by the Greeks, 48. 50.

N.

NICOMACHUS, Painter, 171.

NIGHTINGALE, her finging characterized by Homer, 15.

Nomes, not effentially diffinguished from Dithyrambics by the objects of their imitation, 177. 180.

Novels, a good apologetical motto for them, 407.—improbability often unreasonably objected to them, 407, 408.

O.

OBJECTS, rural, in what manner usually described by the antients, 30, n.—examples from Theorritus, Virgil, and Plato, ibid.

OLYMPUS, his facred Music, 257, and n.

ΌμαδΦ-, 518.

'Ομαλως, 336.

OPPIAN, 503.

O415, 75, n.

ORCHESTRA, 103, n.

Ωσαυτως, codem fenfu, 531, 532.

INDEX II.

P.

Painting, the three styles of it mentioned by Aristotle applicable to modern artists, Page 171, 172.

PAINTINGS, indecent, allowed in the temples of some heathen deities, 169.

PANTOMIME, modern, Aristotelic analysis of it, 317, 318.

--- Roman, 318, n.

PARABASIS, of the Greek Comedy, 220.

Παρασμευαζειν, 198.

Παραφυλαττεσθαι, 390.

Παρ' ἐπομενον, (a consequenti,) the logical forhism fo called, what, 486.—how applied by Aristotle to Homer's management of siction, 485—488.

PARODE, of the Greek Chorus, to what kind of melody it was fet, 293—295.—a fpecimen of that melody from Dionysius Halicarn. ibid.—of the Orestes of Euripides, ibid.—always fung by the Chorus either at, or soon after, their first entrance upon the stage, 296. 298, 299.—was sometimes in the regular Lyric form, of Strophe and Antistrophe, 298, n.

PARODIES, a favourite species of humour with the Athenians—specimens of them₃. 175, 176.

Passion, the natural Poetry of, 493, 494.

Passions, purgation of, by Tragedy, confidered, 231-242.—how far the frequent exercise of them, by works of imagination, may tend to moderate and refine them in real life, 240, 241.

 $\Pi \alpha \theta n$, 288.

Παθηματα, used by Aristotle as fynonymous with Παθη, 235, n.

Pathetic, not attainable, either in Poetry or Painting, without close imitation of nature and real life, 510, 511, and n.

Pauson, a licentious Painter, 169, 170.

Pergolesi, 59.

Περιοδ⊕ ήλιε, 227, 228.

Hegimeteia, Revolution, what, 285.—confounded with the μεταβασίς, or change of fortune, common to all Tragedy, 283—285.

Перітти, 481.

PETRARCH, 444.

ΦαυλΘ, ΣπεδαιΘ, 183, 184.

Φιαλη, 442.

Φιλανθεωπον, 305, 306. 406.

Флин i дарк, Page 559.

PHILOXENUS, the Poem of his, alluded to by Arithetle, not a drama, 178.

PHORCIDES, The, 101, n.

Фортию, 540-544.

Piccolomini, his verifion and commentary quoted, 285. 332. 358. 369. 438. 442. 453. 459. 491.—an objection of his removed, 449.

PINDAR, inflances of the dramatic in his Odes, 138, and n.—an Aristotelic passage of, 491.

PLATO, his description of the banks of the Hissus, 30, n. - his idea of Poetic imitation, and in what it differed from that of Aristotle, 40.—his objections to it, 38, n. 41, n.—coincides with Fontenelle as to the want of meaning in inflrumental Music, 49, n.—resolves musical expression into resemblance of speech, 52. his division of Poetry into three kinds, 138. 182 .- uses 2078; 4128; in the fense of Aristotle, for words without music, 154, 155, n.—his idea of Poetry stripped of metre, 158.—his dialogues dramatic—fometimes affed, 163, and n.—attributes to Music the imitation of monners and characters, 173.—his idea of Comedy agrees with Ariftotle's, 213, and n.—his objection to Tragedy, 239, 240, and n.—calls Homer Τραγωδίοποι ., and Epic Poetry, Tragic, 315, n. his idea of the danger of exhibiting bad characters in Poetic imitation, 326. 328, 329, and n.—his character of Achilles, 351-353.—familiar to him to tpeak of all enthusiasm as a species of madness, 384.—his account of Protagoras. 418.—his address to the Tragic Poets, 497.—in what manner he exposes the notion of Homer's accurate knowledge of arts and sciences, 498.—his whimsical argument to difcredit Poetic imitation, 469, n.—continually reproaching the Poets with violation of truth, 505. 534, 535.—his idea of the use of wine, 512, 513.—a fine passage in him, vindicating the truth and immutability of God. 520.—of the immoral tendency of Homer's fictions, 535.—quoted, 142, 2, 188. 263. 275. 548. 559, and n.

PLAUTUS, and TERENCE, their way of supplying the imperfect conclusions of their plays, 261.

PLAUTUS, of Poetic fiction, 492.

PLAYS, Chinese, their length, 476, n.

PLINY, the Elder, no landscape, or landscape-painter, mentioned in his account of Grecian artists and their works, 34, 35.—his account of Protogenes, 172.

PLINY, the Younger, 35, n. 36.

Plutareh, of vocal mimicry, 41, n.—of the paintings of Dionyfius the Colophonian, 169.—rails at mufical corruption, 179. 306.—of two different ways in which the Tragic lambics were fung, 244. 248.—of a mufical revolution, 279.—his account of the theatrical effect of the discovery in the Gresphontes of Euripides, 325.—quoted, 247, n. 282. 550.

POET-PHILOSOPHERS, Page 164.

POETRY, imitation, in a strict sense, only when dramatic or personative, 21, 22.—to be considered as imitative only in sour senses, 22.—whence, originally, dereminated an imitative art, 38—43.—not read, in general, by the Greeks, but heard, 42.—absurdity of supposing instruction to be its chief end, 561.—its end, according to Aristotle, to give pleasure, 561, 562.

POETRY, Theological, of the Greeks, did not exclude fiction and invention, 138, 139.

POETS, Greek Tragic, obliged to conform to the taste of the people, 206, and n.—compared with Shakspeare, 207. 251.—originally actors also, 377. 416.—the great number of their productions, 480, 481.

Ποεισθαι την μυριητίν, never used by Aristotle for μιμεισθαι simply, 166, 167.

Полития, ('H) — Полити Θ , ('O) — Полития, 255.

Pollux, Jul. a passage about the Syrinx, or Figura Panis, 146, and n.

Polus, the Tragic actor, 550.

Polygnorus, 169.

Pope, his improvement of Homer's local and picturesque descriptions, 31-33, and n, 515.—his Pastorals, 163.

POTTER, Mr. his explanation of Ariftotle's centure of the choral odes of Euripides, 102, n.—his opinion of a passage of Aristotle considered, 338, 339.—of the discovery in the Chocphorae of Euchylus, 368.

Προαιζεσις, 257, π.

Προβληματα, critical, 122, n.

PROLOGUE, Greek, Aristotle's own account of it, 219, 220, and n.—the two different kinds of it expressed, and exemplified, by Terence, 221, 222.—the narrative, 222.—its history and revolutions, 223.

PROLOGUE, of the Greek Comedy, not different from that of Tragedy, 219-221.

of the French Opera, 223.

PROSPECT, (or View,) no fingle Greek or Latin term equivalent to it, 35, n.

Προσβολη, 104, 105, 11.

Πρωταγωνισης, 197.

PROTAGORAS, fingular history of him, 417, 418.

ΨιλΦ, 154, 155.

PTOLEMY, of descriptive imitation, 10, n.

PURCELL, 59.

Q.

QUINTILIAN, of 1000 and $\pi a000$, Page 250, n.—his character of Euripides, 256.—of Zeuxis, 265.—illustrates a passage of Aristotle, 424.—of the use of metaphors, 453.—of the diction of Euripides, 470, n.

QUIXOTE, Don, his idea of translation, 186, n.

R.

RACINE, 385.

RAPHAEL, 171, 172.

Pαθυμ@, 348.

READING, not a general practice with the antients, as with us, 42, 43, and n. 242.

RECITATIVE, of the Greek Tragedy, 247.

RECITATIVE, Choral, 294, n.

REYNOLDS, Sir Yoshua, quoted, 81, n. 171, 172.—of individuality of imitation in painting, 511, n.

RHAPSODISTS, 43, n.-recited, or declaimed, only, 549.

Rнутны, 70, п.

RICHARDSON, his Lovelace, 119, 120, n. 535.

RICHARDSON, the painter, 171, 172, and n.—describes the paintings of Mich. Angelo and Raphael in Aristotle's terms, 172.

RIDDLE, Greek, 455.

RIDICULOUS, (The) Aristotle's account of it defended, 213-217.

ROBORTELLI, his commentary quoted, 324, 7.

RONDEAU, 187, 188.

ROUSSEAU, misunderstood by Dr. Beattie, 6, n.—attributes all expression in Music to imitation, more or less perceptible, of speech, 51.—of the effect of passion in melodizing the voice, 52, n.—his inconsistence in afferting that harmony was no expression, 55, 56, n.—his absurd idea of the theatrical declamation of the antients, 243.—a Platonic writer, 329.—agrees with Plato in his objections to dramatic imitation, ibid.

RUBENS, 172.

INDEXII.

S.

SAMPSON AGONISTES, Page 260.

SATAN of Milton, his manners xensa, according to Le Bossu, 325.

SATYR, and SATIRE, 73, n.

SATYRIC Drama, probably much fhorter than the ferious Tragedy, 478, n.

Scaliger, 7. C. of descriptive imitation, 9, n.—his notion of Poetic imitation, 28, n.

Scaliger, Joseph, 363.

Scenery, painted, 199.

Scenery, dreffes, music, &c. how Aristotle meant to extend to them his precepts respecting the manners, and improved imitation, of Tragedy, 354, 355.

Σχηματα λεξεως, figures of speech, what Aristotle meant by them, 413. 416. 429.— whence denominated σχηματα, or figures, 415.

Sculpture, of the antients, fometimes coloured, 142, n.

Σημειου, 360, 361.

SENTENCE, no Greek word exactly fynonymous to it, 420.

SENTENCES, fignificant, and affertive, a distinction of Aristotle's logic, 420. 430.

Shaftsbury, Lord, his extravagant encomium on the Greek Tragedy, 206.—his mifreprefentation of Ariftotle, ibid.—his explanatory translation of a passage of Aristotle, 266.

SHAKSPEARE, 251. 265. 517.—neglected the conclusions of his plays, 101, n. 261, and n.—his Caliban, 199, n. 488.—compared with the Greek Tragedians, 207.

SHERIDAN, Mr. his Critic, 280.

SHUTTLES, antient, 362, 363.

SIDNEY BIDDULPH, 304.

SIFFLET de chaudronnier, 145.

SINGERS, of the modern Italian, and antient Greek, Opera—their similar influence over Poets and Composers, 279, 280.

SINGING, in what effentially different from speech, 52, n. 296, n.

Σκληγοτης, 349, 350.

Socrates, not fond of the country, and his reason, 30, n.

SOPHISM, Poetic, of Homer's fictions, explained, 486-488.

SOPHISTS, their critical cavils, 277.

Sophocles, fometimes familiar and Tragi-comic, 201, 202. 205.—his fcenes of altercation, how characterized by a Comic Poet, 201, n.—his prologues, 220.—his description of Oedipus tearing out his own eyes, 289.—did not observe

4 G

I N D E X II.

the French rule, " de ne pas ensunglanter le Theatre," Page 290. - his diction, 469. - in what sense he "drew men as they ought to be," 506-509.

SOPHRON, imitated in an Idyl of Theocritus, 162.

Sounds, imitative description of, 11-15.

Spenser, defects of a famous stanza in his Faery Queen, 13, 14, n.

ΣπεδαιΦ, ΦαυλΦ, 183, 184.

Σπαδαιοτερον, 273.

STASIMON, in what fense " without anapasts and trochees," 301.

STEELE, Mr. his Effay on the Mclody, &c. of Speech, 58, n.

STHENELUS, infipidity of his language, how represented by Aristophanes, 452, 453.

STRABO, of Homer's mixture of truth with fiction, 486. - of the end of Poetic fiction, 504.

STROPHE and Antistrophe, set to the same melody, 178, n.

SURPRISE, heightens passion, 281, and n.

Syrinx, or Pipe of Pan, 144, 145.—a South Sea inftrument, 145.—two different instruments of this name mentioned by Jul. Pollux, 146.—its tone characterized in the Homeric hymn to Mercury, 147.—doubts and conjectures concerning the instrument of this name mentioned by Aristotle, 145—148.

T.

TALE OF ALCINOUS, 364-366.

Тенитрич, 360, 361.

TERENCE, 221, 222.

TERROR—Aristotle seems to have thought it sometimes pushed to excess by the Greek Tragedians, 323.

TETRALOGIA, Tragic, the dramas that composed it performed on different festivals, 475-477.

THEOCRITUS, his 15th Idyl, an admirable example of the close and natural delineation of common life, 162.—his description, Idyl 7, not of the landscape kind, 30, n.

THEODORUS, the Tragic actor, his voice, 41, n.

THEOPHRASTUS, of the effect of passion upon the melody of speech, 51, 52, n.— of the dance called κορδαξ, 165, n.

THOMSON, fills up a sketch of Virgil, 445.

Ospußer, 190, 11.

Tour, an emendation of his confidered, 544.

TRACHINLE

INDEXII

TRACHINIÆ of Sophocles, Page 229.

TRAGEDY, not distinguished, originally, from Comedy, 206, and n.—its end, according to Aristotle, 323.—its effect does not depend upon our ignorance of its catastrophe, 393.—its different species, 398.—not perfectly separated from Comedy in Aristotle's time, 400.—how much its effect depends on the sable, 412, and n.—Aristotle's preference of it to the Epic Poem considered, 563, 564.

TRAGEDY, French, 207, n. 251. 289. 385. 451.

TRAGEDY, Greek, the Lyric, exceeded the Dialogue, part of it, before Æschylus, 196.
—its short dialogue, or sixouvbia, [See Jul. Pollux, IV. 17.] 200.—whether sung throughout, 243—245.—what parts of it most likely to have been sieken, 245, 246.—absurd to attribute to it the delicacy of the French stage, 289—291.—vain attempts of Dacier, Brumoy, &c. to divide it into sive ass, 297.—its diction, 451.—observations on the progress and improvements of its diction, 469, 470.

TRAGEDY, the infernal, 401, 402.

TRAGEDIES, Greek, not to be represented as correct and perfect models, 206.—their inequalities, and intermixture of low and comic dialogue, 200—206. 400.—their popular and Tragi-comic origin may be traced in them, 205, 206. 222.—on what occasions their length might be limited by the magistrate, 268. 478.—faid to have been sometimes played by the hour-glass, ibid.—conjecture as to the number performed in one day, and to one audience, at the Tragic contests, 474—478.—of very different lengths, 477, 478, n.

TRAGI-COMEDY, Greek, 202-205.

Translation, Don Quixote's notion of it, 186, n,—fometimes unavoidably paraphraftical, 383, 384.

TROCHAIC tetrameter, how characterized by Aristotle, 164, n. 208, 209.—though a fatyric measure, does not occur in the only satyric drama extant, 208.

U. V.

VALCKENAER, of the Mimes of Sophron, 161.

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, his account of theatrical riots at Rome, 149.

VATRY, Albé, his presumptive proof that the Greek Tragedy was fung throughout, 245.

Υδαρες, 559.

VELLEIUS PATERCULUS, of Homer, 473.

VERSE, the difference between it, and well measured prose, less with the antients than with us, 153, 154, and n.—essential to Poetry in the general opinion of the antients, 157, 158. 495, 496.—included in Aristotle's general idea of Poetry, 157, 192.

VICTORIUS,

7 N D E \mathbf{x} 17.

VICTORIUS, his commentary quoted, Page 26. 271, n. 399. 500. ct passim.

VILLAINY, atrecious, its effect in Tragedy, 535, and n .- Plato's and Rouffeau's idex of the exhibition of it, 329.

Virgil, 5, n. 15. 17, 18. 32, n. 443, 445, 564, n.—his ear, 7, n.—his description of a plough, how far imitative description, 29, n.

VIRTUE, (ἀρετη,) its extensive signification in antient writers, 184, and π.

ULYSSES, ridiculous flory of his feigned madnefs, SI, n.—his comic cowardice in the Ajax of Sophocles, 205.—was the subject of many dramas, comic, as well as tragic, 370.

Unities, firica Dramatic, of time and place, have no authority from Aristotle, 226-228.—nor from the constant practice of the Greek Poets, 228, 229.

UNITY of time, a remarkable instance of its violation in Sophocles, 229.

UNITY of Fable, Aristotle's distinction between that, and the unity of Hero, defended, 268, 269.

VOLTAIRE, his censure of the Occlipus Tyrannus, as prolonged beyond its proper end, 262.—mistake: Aristotle, 324, 325.—Τραγροδοδιδασκαλ 3, 416. Υποδεσθαι, 532.

W.

WARTON, Dr. 138, n. 290.—of a stanza in Spenser, 14, n.

WARTON, Mr. his centure of the prologue of Comus, 299, 300.

WINCKELMAN, Abbé, 34, n.

Women, Aristotle's character of them, 330.

Wood, Preface to his Elfay on the Orig. Genius of Homer, quoted, 36, n.

Words, objects, to what class of Aristotle's poetic words they are to be referred, 462.

X.

XENOPHANES, fragments of, 511, 512.—his idea of moderate drinking, 512. 627 XENOPHON, 264. .

7..

ZEUXIS, 130, n. 265. 529, 530, and n. Lugoreger, 521.

University of California SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY 405 Hilgard Avenue, Los Angeles, CA 90024-1388 Return this material to the library from which it was borrowed.

SCHOOL STATE OF THE PARTY OF TH

The state of the s

WINNIN III TORSON TO

A STATE OF THE STA

T INFARY

